Questions and Answers

Reader, Hackensack, N. J. What is the chutiya, and does it possess any religious significance?

The choti or chutiya is a lock of hair worn by Hindus on the crown and uncut from birth. It tells that the wearer is a devout Hindu, and the wearing is regarded as a strictly religious custom. The wearer carefully ties up this particular lock of hair and places in it a flower of the sacred Bel leaf, which he has first presented before his idol. He believes that when the "evil hour" comes, his favorite god or goddess will grasp him by the chutiya and bring him safely through. When a Hindu is converted to Christianity, and has been baptized, the chutiya is usually cut off, although this is not insisted upon by all missionaries.

S. M. H., New Hampshire. Please give the author of these lines:

"The man that hails you Tom or Jack
And proves by thumping on your back
His sense of your great merit," etc.

The author is William Cowper.

E. M. B., Providence, R. I. In Lev. 16: 8 we read of Aaron casting lots. Is this and other similar references to casting lots considered gambling?

The use of the lot as a means of deciding questions of various kinds was very general among the ancients. It commended itself as a sort of appeal to heaven, and also as a kind of divination. The Israelites sometimes had recourse to lots as a primitive method of learning the divine will, or where enterprises were in doubt, or for disposing of prisoners of war, or deciding where a criminal's guilt was in doubt. In the sacred ritual of the Hebrews, however, the lot is only once prescribed, viz.: in the selection of the scapegoat (Lev. 16: 8).

F. D., Kansas City, Kan. I read in a paper not long ago that "The Bible named Cyrus 200 years before he was born, and said he should be sent to destroy Babylon." What prophet prophesied this and where can it be found in the Bible?

The passages to which you refer are Isa. 44: 28 and 45: 1. According to the records accepted by the historians, Isaiah's active prophetic life was passed between 783 and 705 B.C., while Cyrus' active career was from 559 to 529 B.C.

Old Subscriber, Iola, Wis. What is the meaning of Matt. 5: 40?

Our Lord in this passage was contrasting the law of love and forbearance and long-suffering with the old Mosaic law of reprisal: "An eye for an eye; a tooth for a tooth." He showed how the old law was abused, and instead he advised his followers rather to suffer wrong than to indulge the spirit of vengeance (see John 18: 22, 23). We need not invite wrong or injury, but we ought to be prepared to submit to them, rather than do wrong ourselves or give way to violent retaliation.

Mrs. M. E. H., Harpersville, N. Y. I. John 5: 1, 18 means that whosoever believes in Christ as the Divine Redeemer, and loves him and does his will and loves also his fellow-men, is born of God; to such a one his sins are not imputed and he relies upon divine help to keep him from falling back into wilful sin. But verse sixteen shows that he also must struggle against sin. 2. Bible students do not say anything of the kind. The wine made miraculously at Cana, it is believed, was the fresh juice of the grape. No gift ever came from the hand of God to steal away the brains of men or brutalize their bodies.

G. W. Y., Cambridge, Mass. Please explain Job 1: 6.

"Sons of God" here means angels (compare Job 2: 1; also 38: 7). The term may have three different interpretations, viz.: (1) Angels; (2) saints on earth, who lead pure upright lives; (3) the direct lineal descendants of the Sethites who had maintained their true filial relationship to God. The view held by some that the phrase in Gen. 6: 2 refers to angels is rejected by practically all the commentators, in view of the distinct declaration in Luke 20: 35, 36.

Mrs. M., Oklahoma. What did Christ mean in Matt. 27: 46, when he said: "Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani"?

This cry from the cross was not uttered in the current tongue of the time (Greek), but in the native Chaldee or Syriac form of the Psalm from which it is quoted (Ps. 22). His mind had been prophetically prepared for this crisis, yet now, when the face of the Father was in eclipse, Jesus utters this cry of conscious innocence, wrung from him by physical pain and weakness; but at this moment there was no divine assuagement. He had submitted to the Father's will and was now drinking the cup to the dregs, besides enduring the mental anguish caused by the momentary absence of heavenly reinforcement. But his victory was at hand, and a few moments later he announced it with the cry: "It is finished!"

R. H. F., Amsterdam, N. Y. 1. Will not "deliberate sin" be forgiven if truly repented of? 2. Can Matt. 27: 52, 53 be explained?

1. We can place no limit to God's mercy. Jesus said: "Whosoever will." 2. The passage is difficult, but the commentators practically agree that it does not mean that they (the buried saints) were quickened into resurrection life at the moment of their Lord's death, but that their graves were opened by the earthquake and that they arose after his resurrection. It was fitting that he should be the first to rise from the dead. After this explanatory passage (which is in its natural place in Matthew's Gospel) the narrative of the crucifixion is resumed.

Inquirer, Des Moines, Ia. How many men, on the average, does the Bowery Mission Free Labor Bureau find employment for each week?

During the week ending December 3, 1910, the Bureau found employment in the country for two men; in the city for thirty-three men. Total placed in positions up to December 3, 1910, was 9,306 men.

China Again Fighting Famine

FAMINE has again broken out in the provinces of China along the Grand Canal. It is now raging in the same region that was devastated by the great famine of 1907, when the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent two cargoes of grain, in the government troopships Buford and Logan, to feed the starving multitudes. News from Peking by cable states that

> "Roads in the Yangtse-kiang famine districts are dotted with the dead and the dying from hunger, and the cold season is intensifying the distress. More than a million children have been sold by their parents to procure food. Relief committees are appealing to other countries for aid."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, immediately on receipt of the news of the suffering in China, communicated with our State Department in Washington on the subject. The following letter from the Hon. P. C. Knox, Secretary of State, has been received in reply:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE.
"WASHINGTON, December 21, 1910

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,
"Bible House, New York City.

"SIRS: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th instant asking information concerning the famine reported as existing in China.

"In reply I beg to say that the Department received a telegram a few days since, from the American Consul at Nanking, stating that he had investigated the situation and found that there was a very serious famine in the northern part of the Province of Anhui, affecting no less than a million people. The Department therefore requested the American Minister at Peking to report upon the advisability of an appeal in the United States for relief. His reply is just received, and is to the effect that the Legation is not well informed and is, therefore, reluctant to express any opinion, but that at a recent meeting of the foreign relief committee held in Shanghai, it was stated that two and a half million people were very seriously affected by the famine, covering an area of seven thousand square miles, and that four million Mexican dollars were required to provide adequate relief. The Minister adds that assistance could only be beneficial in any event, and suggests that, if aid is forthcoming, the American Consul at Nanking and the provincial delegate to the National Assembly at Peking be placed upon the committee distributing relief.

"Should you desire to communicate with the Relief Committee at Shanghai, Honorable Amos P. Wilder, the American Consul-General there, will undoubtedly be happy to give his assistance in the matter.

"P. C. KNOX."

Communication has also been opened with our missionaries in China concerning this latest visitation of famine and with our Consul General at Shanghai. Meanwhile any contributions sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by its readers for famine relief will be acknowledged and forwarded to the Missionary Committee at Shanghai for distribution in the affected district.

In response to an inquiry by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Mr. Gerald Holbrooke, of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police (Esterhazy Detachment), Canada, sends this note relative to the offender who caused false reports to be printed in many American newspapers, regarding American settlers in Saskatchewan: "Willis P. Sherman appears to have arrived in Tantallon after he had written that letter to the mayor of Pittsburg. While at Tantallon, he was employed as night operator with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and after a short stay was shifted to Oak Lake. Arriving there under the influence of liquor, he was dismissed from the service. Meantime the postmaster at Tantallon, having his suspicions aroused, communicated with the post office inspector, who, taking action, had Sherman arrested in Winnipeg, tried in Regina, and on pleading guilty, he received fourteen days hard labor for false misrepresentations. I might add that there are not more than four or five American families residing at or near Tantallon, and of course there is no club of the sort mentioned by Sherman in his letter."

C. A. W., Huntsville, Ont. What was the name of the Greek poet referred to by Paul in Acts 17: 28?

Paul's quotation was from an astronomical poem by Aratus, a Greek poet, who lived three centuries earlier. The same sentiment is found also in a religious hymn by Cleanthus of Troas, a contemporary of Aratus, and other poets. They meant it in a pantheistic sense, but Paul turned it to his own purpose to teach a personal spiritual theism.

D. D. G., Dayton, O. Please explain Ex. 4: 23.

God called Israel his "first-born." Pharaoh's refusal to let Israel go brought down upon him the divine displeasure, and as an act of retribution, the first-born throughout all Egypt were to suffer —a terrible punishment to the rebellious monarch.

Miscellaneous

R. C. B., Athens, N. Y. Send full name and address for reply by mail.

Mrs. G. M., Upper Sandusky, O. Don't know who first wrote "Xmas" for Christmas.

J. B. S., Harvard, Ill. We cordially agree with your letter, but have nothing to add to our comments on the case, already published.

R. J. G. 1. The unpardonable sin is believed to have been attributing the works of the Holy Spirit to Satanic agency. 2. Suggestion regarding Abraham's faith and what it might have accomplished toward saving Sodom is wholly speculative. Prompted by faith in God and in his mercy, Abraham did all he could to save Sodom.

C. H. S., Stamford, Conn. Egyptologists claim to have identified the body of Meneptah in the Hall of Kings, at Cairo. Some scholars dispute the identification and there the matter rests. As already stated in THE MAIL-BAG, the identifiers urge that the dead body of Pharaoh may have been recovered from the sea and embalmed. In our view, there can be no positive claim either way.

M. T., Coleman, Mich. God is not a "respecter of persons." Rich and poor, great and simple, are alike in his eyes, save that the greater power involves the larger accountability. God does not regard the outer appearance but judges the heart. Of these facts we are assured in Scripture many times. For your other question see John 5:22-27; Acts 10: 42; Rom. 14: 10; II. Cor. 5: 10; Matt. 25: 31; II. Tim. 4: 1.

Mrs. F. S., Birmingham, Ala., writes: "I see in THE MAIL-BAG for December 7, H. A. H., Chicago, Ill., doubts whether a druggist can be a Christian. I would like to tell about a man in our city. Mr. A. B. and his brother C. have two drug stores. They also sell poultry and dairy supplies and garden seeds. They also have a restaurant, feeding 1,000 every day. When Sunday comes, a sign is put on the counter where all can see it, 'Nothing sold to-day but necessary drugs.' They do a big business in all lines and are Christian men. On Sunday they cover all their show cases up, so no one can see in them."

E. A. S., Provincetown, Mass. 1. There are two senses in which history proves the truth of the Bible: (a) It shows its applicability to the human race in every age and condition; (b) Many of its statements, historical and otherwise, which are disputed, have been confirmed by discoveries made in Bible lands by eminent archæologists, who have brought to light monuments, tablets and inscriptions in Egypt, Babylonia, Assyria and elsewhere corroborative of Bible history. 2. The "times of restitution" referred to in Acts 3: 21 is interpreted as meaning the rectification of all the disorders brought about by the fall.

The British Elections

THE general elections in Great Britain resulted in leaving the strength of the parties practically the same as in the last Parliament. With the exception of a few changes the new House of Commons will be the same as the old. The following figures show the result:

LAST HOUSE
Liberals	275
Labor members	40
Nationalists	71
Independent Nationalists	11
Total Government Coalition	397
Unionists	273
Coalition majority	124
PRESENT HOUSE
Liberals	273
Labor members	43
Nationalists	72
Independent Nationalists	10
Total Government Coalition	398
Coalition majority	126

Prominent leaders on both sides prophesied stormy times; but the electors calmly surveyed the situation from a practical standpoint. By their present vote, they have ratified and approved the policy of the Liberal government; hence, legislation in the new Parliament will be on the same footing as before the dissolution of the old one. To all intents and purposes, the past election has been the equivalent of a referendum on the Veto Bill, and now that the people have declared their will on that subject, the Lords will be compelled to defer to the wishes of the Commons in the matter of Liberal legislation. This means that the long-vexed Irish question will be settled in some way. As to the present Veto Bill, there can be little doubt that the Lords will pass the measure, in face of the verdict which the electorate have just rendered. Should they refuse to endorse the bill, an appeal could be made to the King to create as many new peers as would overcome the resistance of the Lords, but this would be a last resort.

The probable outcome of the election will be a vigorous protest against the bill on the part of the opposition, consoling themselves with the reflection that when they get into power again, they will have the opportunity to repeal it. Once the veto question is settled, Home Rule for Ireland will be the prominent issue. The Irish Nationalists control the balance of power, and Mr. Redmond, their leader, has been styled "Dictator" of the House of Commons. There is no doubt that Premier Asquith chafes under the menace of the Irish whip. That Ireland will get some form of autonomy seems almost assured. Two-fifths of the people of Ireland, those of Ulster or the Northern province, are violently opposed to Home Rule and threaten to resort to physical resistance if a native parliament is established in Dublin. The North, which is the richest and has the great commercial city of Belfast, is almost exclusively Protestant, the Presbyterian denomination prevailing. Whatever the issue may be, Home Rule for Ireland has never risen so prominently above the horizon of British politics as now.

The Children's Pulpit

THE ELBIB LIBRARY

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

DO YOU have a library? I am quite sure you have a number of good books. But do you have a library all your own? I mean a book case with shelves low enough for you to reach. Shelves with books on them. If your papa and mamma can have a five-foot library shelf I believe you should have room at least for a Five-Inch Library Shelf. Shall I tell you about more than half a hundred wonderful books that every boy and girl should have? Fine books, and you can put them all on a five-inch shelf. Ask papa and mamma if they will put up for you a little shelf in a little corner of your little room. The books I want you to place first in your new library are from the brain and heart of one person. This person asked a number of people to write the different books. No other set of books ever written gives us so many stories for girls and stories for boys. Stories you boys and girls can read in the morning, stories that will make your blood tingle. Books that will start you out in fine form for the day's work. There are some wonderfully sweet stories for girls. Needlework stories, garden stories, flower stories, game stories and some wonderfully nice stories of what little girls can do. For boys there are sea stories, sailing and shipwreck stories, chariot races, foot races and some wonderful stories of floods and fires. For some reason this library has not been found by the boys and girls. Grown-up people like the books and read them. I fear the grown-ups have forgotten to put these books where you children can reach them. The person who gave them to us from his brain and heart said that the children were first in his heart. That is the reason the books have so many stories for children. I know you all love a story, and I shall tell you one about these books.

WHEN the author had these books written he did something that no other writer of books has ever done. He sent with the books the light by which they are to be read. Just imagine going to a bookstore and having a candle wrapped up with the books you purchase! You would ask: "What am I to do with this candle? We have gas and electric lights in our house." The bookstore man answers, "You are to read this book by the light of this candle." "But why should I read this book by candle light?" If he told you that you could not understand the book unless you read it by this light you would take good care of the candle. You would light it and sit by it when reading the book.

NOW the books I am telling you about have a candle that goes with them, and no one has ever been able to understand the books unless he reads them by the light of this candle. Some great scholars have tried to understand the books, but have not found just what the author wanted them to know. But some people who did not have a great education and who live in garrets or very small rooms have read the books by the light of this candle and have understood them as no other readers have understood them.

In 1382 John Wyclif translated the Elbib books into English in order that we could read them. On the first page is the picture of a candle with a bright flame. A number of men with Satan are trying to blow out the flame. Satan on his hands and knees with swollen cheeks and livid face is blowing hard. But the more they all blow the brighter the candle burns, until they are compelled to run from the hot flame. For the candle that gives light for all who read the books will burn and destroy those who try to destroy them.

THERE was a man by the name of John Bunyan who was arrested and put in jail in the town of Bedford, England. He had only a small room or cell, but found a corner large enough for this Elbib Library. By the light of the Elbib candle he read the books until a light came into his brain. Then from his jail window he had a wonderful vision. He saw a man walking and carrying a great burden. The vision was so wonderful that he wrote a book about this man, a wonderful book, called Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. All the great truths in his book were found by Bunyan in his Elbib Library. If you will read the books by the light of the candle you, too, will want to write a book about the wonderful stories.

YOU will notice that we call it the ELBIB Library. Many of the Elbib books were written by the Hebrews and they read backward. If you will read ELBIB as the Hebrews would read it you will get the real name of our five-inch library. ELBIB, read backward, is a Greek word and means Book.

In the twentieth book of this library, the twentieth chapter and the twenty-seventh verse, we are told that the spirit of man is the candle of the Lord. In the nineteenth book, the eighteenth chapter, in the twenty-eighth verse, we are told, "For thou wilt light my candle." The person who gave us these books is therefore the Lord who has put this candle into our lives. We call it our spirit. The Lord lights our spirit with his spirit and when we sit down to read these books with the Lord's light burning we can understand what the Lord wanted us to know.

Next week I shall tell you more about this wonderful Elbib Library.

For the New Year

BEGIN the year with God, my friend;
Begin with Him the year.
Step boldly out in untried ways
With courage and good cheer.
He sees the way, He knows the path
O'er mountain-top or vale.
He'll lead thee with His own right hand,
With Him thou canst not fail!
A glad new year, if here or there,
This year to thee shall be,
So free from every anxious care,
If He but leadeth thee.

"Mother's Day" at Akron

AKRON, O., is still in the midst of the great wave of revival which broke out there several weeks ago. Thirty-one churches and organizations are participating in the movement. The meetings are held in a spacious tabernacle, with a seating capacity of 5,000. A special feature of the work has been the great number of factory delegations occupying reserved sections in the building, frequently coming with bands and carrying banners, flags, and decorations. Probably the greatest meeting was that for men on Sunday afternoon, when over 5,000 packed the tabernacle. Dr. Biederwolf delivered a sermon on intemperance.

One of the most enjoyable of the special features was the Mothers' Day meeting Friday afternoon, November 18. Truly, as one of the local papers said, "They were there Friday afternoon, five thousand strong, young mothers, old mothers, small mothers, large mothers, tall mothers, short mothers, in fact all kinds of mothers, grandmothers and great-grandmothers with their dear sweet faces, listening to the impressive words of the evangelist." White carnations were everywhere. Several leading stores acted as "flower stations," and gave out the fragrant blossoms. Several thousand carnations were thus given away. The platform was decorated with potted and cut flowers, which were tied in bunches, or taken in jars, the following morning and distributed among the sick and shut-ins.

In beginning the service, the mothers were requested to sing some of the old hymns that were precious to them in their younger days. An old yet sweet voice would start one of the old-time tunes which would immediately be taken up by hundreds and sung heartily until the last note died away. Another and another of the old tunes were sung. It would be hard to say which enjoyed it the most, the singers or those who listened. The oldest woman present was 89, and a number were over 75.

In his talk to mothers, Dr. Biederwolf said in part: "The greatest need of the American people is for more homes where Christ is honored, where God is loved and where the children are taught to pray. Every child has a right to expect a certain heritage from its mother, and of course from its father as well, and that heritage lies in three things: First, What the child receives through birth. Second, The heritage which every mother owes her child in training it in all the things which count for godly character. Third, The example of a consistent Christian life."

It is claimed that the largest number of decisions for Christ, exclusive of children, ever made in a four weeks' meeting in the State of Ohio, were made during this series in Akron.

A Memorial of a Good Man

The volume, The Life Work of Louis Klopsch, reached me in good condition. It is a handsome memorial of a good man, whose many good works are following him. The pretty calendar and excellent picture of Dr. Klopsch were both received. For all of these I return my thanks. May the Lord bless you in the good work you are doing through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

NEW YORK'S FATAL EXPLOSION

Looking Down Lexington Avenue, Showing Demolished Car and Auto

Searching for Bodies Amid the Wreckage of the Explosion

ONE of the most appalling disasters New York City has experienced in many years occurred on Monday morning, December 19. An explosion of Pintsch light gas tanks took place in the power-house of the New York Central Railroad at Lexington Avenue and Fiftieth Street. More than a dozen persons were killed outright and over one hundred so seriously injured as to require hospital treatment. Hundreds more suffered from minor wounds, cuts and bruises caused by falling walls, flying débris and shattered glass.

The explosion took place about 8.20 o'clock A.M., a time when traffic was brisk and when a great number of children were on their way to school. The roar of the explosion was heard for many miles and the concussion shook the earth for a length of twenty city blocks on every side, wrecking the houses in the immediate neighborhood and shattering windows in apartments and hotels for a distance of over a mile from the scene. It is estimated that fully ten thousand windows were broken by the force of the tremor that ran through the gneiss formation underlying this part of the city. Furniture, pictures and bric-a-brac were smashed as if giant hands had picked them up and dashed them against floors and walls. In many places, large pieces were forced through windows from the inside and sent flying for several yards. Some persons were thrown violently out of their beds and, under the shock, could not realize what had happened. In the large apartment houses and hotels women guests ran screaming from their rooms and blocked stairs and corridors. Some in houses in the vicinity of the explosion thought the end of the world had come, and rushed into the streets, gesticulating and shouting like fear-maddened creatures. Others thought an earthquake was at work, and ran up and down in a very frenzy of fright. So tremendous was the noise of the explosion that some have likened it to the roar of ten thousand cannon fired simultaneously, or the detonation of a thousand tons of dynamite. It appears that a train of empty passenger cars, out of control (because no sand was available to check the wheels on the slippery rails), backed into a buffer, knocked the buffer endwise and went on, crashing into an abutment of concrete beneath the annex of the power-house in the sunken yards of the New York Central, twenty feet below the street level. It is supposed that a pipe, carrying the supply of Pintsch gas, was broken by the timber hurled against it by the uncontrollable train, and that the ignition of the gas was due to an electric spark coming from some detached electric wire.

The Pintsch gas is used for illuminating passenger cars, and while nominally non-explosive, in confinement it becomes highly so when mixed with a certain percentage of air. It leaves the large tanks at a pressure of nine atmospheres, or 150 pounds, and is conducted through steel pipes having a valve at every seventy feet from which the vapor can be drawn in flexible pipes to the tanks of the passenger cars. Thousands and thousands of cubic feet of this gas exploded with such terrific force that the brick-tiled roof of the annex was torn from its moorings of steel and hurled into the air. The wall on the Fiftieth Street side was forced out and fell in a jumbled mass of brick, mortar, wood and iron. The steel beams and girders were twisted into fantastic shapes. Heavy timbers, splinters and bars were hurled through the air, crashing here and there through windows and side walls.

A car of the Lexington Avenue line was caught in the heart of the concussion. There were eight passengers. Two of them, women, were instantly killed, the head of one being pierced with a splinter of wood. The impact caught the car broadside and hurled it from the tracks over on a passing automobile, wrecking both car and machine to splinters. The chauffeur jumped and escaped serious injury, but those in the car, other than the two women already dead, fought as maniacs to get out from the shattering glass and splinters until they were covered with blood from the gashes they received.

A young woman, not a passenger, met with a tragic fate. She was employed as stenographer by a down-town magazine and was on her way to the office. It was her custom to ride, but this morning she was walking down the avenue, and had just got opposite the doomed building when the explosion took place. She was blown across the street right in front of the oncoming car and was frightfully crushed and mangled.

Fan-like the effect of the concussion spread, north, south, east and west, affecting an area of more than a square mile, comprising the zone lying between Forty-second and Fifty-ninth Streets and between the East River and Fifth Avenue. The damage to buildings within five blocks from where the explosion took place was estimated at over a quarter million dollars, including $30,000 for window glass alone. The New York Nursery and Child's Hospital, occupying the block on the east side of Lexington Avenue, between Fiftieth and Fifty-first Streets, had all the windows broken, the glass flying in fragments through the rooms, and though several were severely cut, both nurses and children, there was no loss of life. Two largely attended schools were in the danger locality. One of these is the parochial school in Fiftieth Street, connected with St. Patrick's Cathedral, and Public School 18 in Fifty-first Street. As the exact time of the explosion was twenty-two minutes past eight, fortunately it was too early for the great bulk of the children to be on their way to school. Had it happened a quarter of an hour later the loss among the little ones would have been appalling. However, early as it was, many were already hurrying along. A policeman was stationed at the Lexington Avenue crossing. He was guarding two little girls when the explosion occurred. One was torn out of his grasp and hurled several yards, both her legs being broken; the right leg of the other was torn off at the knee. In the Bible Teachers' Training School at Forty-ninth Street and Lexington Avenue every pane of glass in the building was broken. It was the same in the fire house, two blocks farther north. Pieces of broken steel and masonry fell in the rooms, injuring some of the firemen. Many curious freaks of the horror were reported. One man was delivering packages from an express wagon several blocks off. A flying ledge struck his head, killing him instantaneously. A carpenter was driving a nail into a partition when the explosion happened. He was picked up and hurled ten feet and landed in a hallway. A hammer was wrenched from a blacksmith's hand and projected fifty feet through the open door.

After the explosion, the ruins of the power-house building became a flaming furnace, and though six fire companies were soon on the ground it was a stubborn fight to subdue the flames. Police reserves were called out, ambulances came clanging from a dozen hospitals, clergymen rushed from neighboring churches, merchants and clerks ran from their desks, stores, offices, workshops and houses were emptied and a struggling mass of terrified people choked the streets and avenues. It was hours before any kind of order was brought out of the chaotic surroundings.

CURRENT COMMENT ON PASSING EVENTS

—THIS WEEK witnesses the inauguration of the Postal Bank system. One of these banks is to be opened in each State and territory by way of experiment. All the offices selected are of the second class and in localities believed to be favorable to a thorough test.

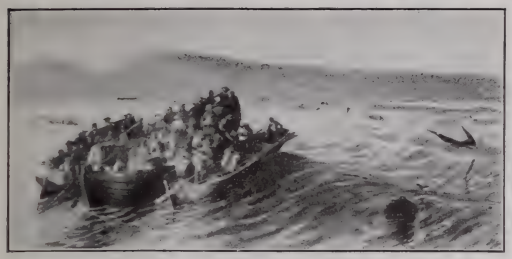
—HON. SERENO E. PAYNE, author of the Payne Tariff Bill, and who is at the head of the House Ways and Means Committee, has declared in favor of the revision of the tariff, schedule by schedule. He is not specially favorable to the creation of a permanent tariff commission.

—WE ARE TO have yet another Dreadnought. The Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company of Newport News, Va., has just been awarded a contract for the building of the Texas, a 27,000-ton war monster. The cost will be close to six million dollars.

—A YOUNG NEW JERSEY physician of advanced ideas has sealed his engagement to a young lady by a gift of books in lieu of the customary engagement ring, which he calls "a symbol of inferiority." The new custom isn't at all likely to become popular with the ladies who prefer the little circlet of gold, with its beautiful symbolism.

—THE EXPENSE ACCOUNT of the Senate for the year ending July 1, 1910, was $2,012,374, and some curious items have crept into it. Pepsine tablets, bromo-seltzer, quinine pills and hoarhound drops figure in the lists, also cologne and violet extract. The amount expended for salaries and mileage was $737,000.

—ABOUT 30,000 Scottish agricultural laborers will arrive in Canada early in January. The Emigration Commission in London has made arrangements with the Canadian railways for transportation to different parts. A large number of Scotch school teachers are also desirous to emigrate to Canada.



—FOR SEVERAL years, the National Association of Letter Carriers has been agitating the question of abolishing Sunday work in the post offices. Detroit is the first large city to give the plan a trial. For a whole month, its 500,000 population will get along without Sunday mail. If the experiment succeeds it will probably be repeated in other cities.

—A TERRIBLE disaster, in which over 300 miners were killed, occurred on December 21, near Bolton, in Lancashire, England. The explosion, which was in the pit of the Hulton Colliery Company, happened early in the morning, a short time after the men had gone to work. The force of the explosion was terrific, and as it was followed by a fierce fire, all attempts at rescue were cut off from the unfortunate victims. Bolton has a population of 200,000, and is eight miles from the manufacturing city of Manchester.

—THUS FAR, the economy programme at Washington has accomplished the following: Abolished 400 minor positions in Treasury Department without impairing its efficiency; dropped 100 unnecessary employees from the Philadelphia mint; saved $10,000,000 in method of collection of duties, port of New York; arranged to pay back into Treasury from Navy Department $2,700,000 which navy finds unnecessary; reduced expenses for 1911 by $50,000,000 or more.

—THE NEW YORK criminal authorities have done vigorous work in ferreting out the kidnappers of the three Italian children, whose imprisonment for ransom was related in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD. Maria Rappa, the woman confederate of the "Black Hand," who was the jailer of the adducted children, has been tried and convicted and may be sentenced to a long term of imprisonment. Three men of the criminal organization are in jail awaiting trial, and still other arrests are expected. If the whole society could be run to earth it would be a public blessing.

SOUTH AFRICA'S FINE PAGEANT

Arrival of the Settlers

Frank Lascelles
Master of the Pageant

First Camp of the Settlers

THE Union of the South African Colonies and the opening of the first Parliament at Cape Town, were celebrated by a gorgeous pageant in the capital city during the closing days of October and the beginning of November. The pageant proper, which depicted an imposing array of incident in the history of the country, covered two days, but the performances in connection with it lasted an entire week from October 29 to November 5.

The occasion was graced by the presence of royalty in the persons of their Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, who had come to South Africa for the opening of the first Parliament. The Duke is the brother of the late King Edward. Viscount Gladstone, son of the great commoner, and who is the first governor-general of the United Commonwealth, took an active part in promoting the general success of the observances, as did also Lord Villiers, the Right Hon. J. X. Merriman, Sir Frederick Smith, the Mayor, and all the influential and representative citizens of Cape Town and elsewhere throughout the United Colonies. The Union Government donated $75,000 for the occasion, and the people subscribed $30,000 in addition.

More than five thousand people took part in the pageant.

The place selected for the representation of the principal features was the beautiful and historic shore of Table Bay, where the early Portuguese navigators landed, and where little fiery-tempered Van Riebeeck, the Dutchman and first governor, first set his "wooden shoon" on African soil. It was an ideal location, with the level expanse of sea on the one side and the veldt stretching away on the other.

All classes were represented in the ceremonies, from the still primitive Bushmen up to the "blue blood" and royalty of England. People came from the Transvaal, from Natal, from the Orange River Free State, from Cape Colony and other divisions to help to make the affair really representative of a united people. For various reasons the history of the past sixty years was not illustrated in the incidents covered by the pageant. Those years have a checkered history in South African annals, a history of several nationalities struggling for mastery, now one, anon another, wading to power. Therefore this period was allowed to "bury its dead" and no one had any desire to resurrect the skeleton of hostile feelings. But the great landmarks that stand out on the way of South African history and show the development of the country were typified in a very pleasing and instructive manner. The first day of the celebration was devoted to eight episodes and the second to nine.

The opening scene revealed the country in the occupation of the oldest race, viz., the Bushmen. These primitive inhabitants were well depicted. They were represented as armed with bows, arrows and assegais. These Bushmen were made to retreat in haste before another race, the Hottentots, who took their places, set up peculiar habitations for themselves, and gave striking illustrations of their quaint manners and customs. Then came the Portuguese under the leadership of Bartholomew Dias, the first European who doubled the Cape of Good Hope, in 1486, and who, proceeding to what is now Algoa Bay, set up the first "padrao" or stone cross on the African continent. Other episodes depicted the court of King John II. of Portugal in 1487, when Dias returned to Lishon and gave a report of the result of his expedition; the arrival of Johan van Riebeeck and his companions on the 6th of April, 1652. The fleet swung into sight and came up Table Bay with sails full set. As the anchor dropped the sails were furled and immediately several small boats put off from the shore. Van Riebeeck was lowered into one of these from which he disembarked with many wooden chests and other curious belongings. Then came his companions, and finally all passed inland, carrying their loads. This was the beginning of the first colonization.

The first British occupation, which began in 1795, was illustrated. The scene was the courtyard of a castle in which Lady Anne Barnard was giving a tea party to the notables of the time.

The second day commenced with a portrayal of William of Orange being proclaimed King of the Netherlands at The Hague.

Another representation of this second day showed the meeting of Mr. Hoffman, first president of the Orange Free State, and Moshesh, the Basuto chief, in 1854, when the president presented the savage leader with a plow in token of peace and amity. The chief's kraal was represented with warriors on guard and natives of the household carrying on their ordinary domestic duties.

The pageant was brought to a close with an allegoric finale indicative of the consummation of the Union of the South African Colonies under one government and one parliament.

The vanquishing of savagery by civilization was illustrated, and the evolution and development of the nation's social and commercial conditions, the whole culminating in a vivid tableau emblematic of the Union, during which representation many thousands joined in the singing of a Te Deum of gratitude and praise.

THE RECORD OF THE PAST YEAR

THE year 1910 made a record which should give it an unique place in the history of the world. Not only was it rich in human achievement, showing the supremacy of man over the forces of nature, but it brought about many wonderful conditions, the influence of which will affect the future for a long period. What was regarded as the fixed destinies of nations and peoples have been changed, the currents of the past have been diverted from their former courses and made to flow in new channels, the wand of a marvelous progress has been waved over the earth, and lo, there has been such a resultant transformation that it seems as if we were transferred to some different planet in the universe of space. We used to walk, now we fly; formerly we had to expend much lung power and nerve force in shouting so that our neighbor could hear us across the way, now, thanks to the perfecting of wireless telegraphy, we can converse with our friends in China or Peru without speaking at all.

From a material standpoint as affecting the nations it was a remarkable year. While some stars sank beneath the horizon others appeared above it. The lurid fires of revolution surrounded the palace of Portugal and her boy king was hurled from the throne. On the other hand, Montenegro, last of the principalities set up by the treaty of Berlin (1878), became a kingdom, and Prince Nicholas ascended the throne. The star of empire rose in the vast Southland of Africa, where the erstwhile warring colonies united into a solid commonwealth, with one parliament. The other great dependencies of Britain, Canada and Australia, made a mighty headway and ere long both will have an independent army and navy.

Germany has had no complications, but is still increasing her army and navy and keeping an eye on England. The Russian bear emitted few growls, knowing that it was his policy to keep quiet. The other countries of Europe were more or less passive. The Church and State still clashed in France. Spain had a similar experience, the land of Ferdinand the Catholic dealt some hard blows to the Vatican.

In the Far East, Japan kept on the alert. She is lustful of power and continues to strengthen her sea forces by building Dreadnoughts. The dread spectre of famine again visited China and planted his footsteps deep in death and misery.

While, however, we have increased our population, a large number of notable men and women has passed away. All walks of life and professions were depleted by the loss of leading exponents. Among men of affairs, great philanthropists and reformers who died during the year just closed were J. H. Converse, Philadelphia; John Farson, Chicago; John S. Huyler, D. O. Mills and H. McK. Twombley, of New York; Harry Treat Paine and last but not least Dr. Louis Klopsch, "the friend of humanity." Of men prominent in the educational field, James Barr Ames, of Harvard; A. M. Elliott, of Johns Hopkins, and William G. Sumner, of Yale, passed away. The Church in America mourns Bishop McVickar, of Providence, and Spellmyer, of Cincinnati. Vacant seats at bench and bar are those of Melville W. Fuller, late Chief Justice of the Supreme Court; Associate Justice David J. Brewer, and Lloyd Bowers, late solicitor-general. The world of art is poorer for the loss of Winslow Homer, John LeFarge and J. Q. A. Ward. Literature was bereft of "Mark Twain" (S. L. Clemens), "O. Henry" (Sidney Porter), Goldwin Smith, Julia Ward Howe, Rebecca Harding Davis and "Myra Kelly" MacNaughton. Of American scientists we mourn Alexander Agassiz, Arthur E. Brown, Professor William James and J. V. Shoemaker. In politics and diplomacy we miss Senators Clay, Daniel, Dolliver and McEnery, ex-Senator Platt, ex-Secretary of the Treasury J. G. Carlisle and ex-Senator and Governor D. B. Hill. Of the army and navy who answered to death's roll-call were Brigadier-Generals Candy, Chipman, Magruder and Meade, with Rear-Admirals Burwell, Dyer, Hichborn, McCalla and Read.

In the ranks of distinguished Europeans the grim reaper was also busy in 1910. King Edward VII. and Count Tolstoy were the most prominent to fall. Other foreign notables were the Duke of Veragua (who visited us in 1893 as the descendant of Columbus), Prince Francis of Teck, the Duchess of Braganza, Earl Spencer, Serge Muromotseff, ex-President of the Russian Douma, Count Von Tattenbach, Cardinal Satolli, Sir William Huggins, Holman Hunt, the English, and William Maris, the Dutch painter, Bjornstjerne Bjornson, Sir George Newnes, Florence Nightingale and Lady Louisa de Rothschild.

Of others than Europeans death called Chulalongkorn I. of Siam, Azad-el-Mulk, Regent of Persia, Vice-Admiral Williams, and President Jorge Montt of Chile, President Obaldia of Panama, Nord Alexis, ex-President of Haiti, Boutros, Premier of Egypt, Prince Iwaskure, Japanese Imperial Household, Horzmuzd Rassam, Assyriologist, and Mohammed Rakhim Bahdas, Khan of Khiva.

"A Perfect Dear!"

We are very much pleased and want to thank you for the two pictures which we just received from your paper of Dr. Louis Klopsch and "The Pacifier," which is a "perfect dear," with her pretty blue eyes. We are having it framed to hang in our new Children's Ward, which is to be opened at Christmas time, and we know the children will all love the little beauty.

How Is Your Own Church?

THERE are indications that the Christian Church is approaching an important crisis in its history. In recent years, it has been made a target for criticism from many quarters. Some of our leading publications have charged that it is decadent; that it no longer attracts the people as in earlier days; that church building has been overdone in many localities, both in city and country. These statements are usually made in a general form, and without any attempt at detail. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD believes that the charges, not being based on accurate knowledge of real conditions, are incapable of demonstration in a very large majority of cases. We believe, however, that the time has come for setting forth the truth about church conditions throughout the country, in justice to the churches themselves, to their congregations, and to all who believe in the ultimate triumph of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

How is it in your own home church—the church of which you are a member and which you and your household attend? Whether you live in a large city or in a town or village, you must be vitally interested in this question. We invite you to write to us a frank, open letter concerning the spiritual condition of your local church, whatever its denomination.

Is it gaining or losing in membership?

Is the Gospel faithfully preached?

If it is making spiritual progress, tell us about it and what has helped it most.

If it is losing ground, tell us frankly the facts and state the cause, without undue personal reflections. Your letter may be a great help to many other churches in like circumstances.

Christian people who love God and his work need not be afraid or ashamed of the truth. We believe that there is not a Christian church in all the land, from the big city to the smallest hamlet, whose experience will not carry a helpful lesson to other churches. The work of the Holy Spirit is not bound by geographical limitations. There are many congregations in obscure localities where a wonderful work is going on, and where souls are being saved. We want to hear from these churches, and not from them alone, but from those other churches, rural or urban, of all denominations, that have been praying for a spiritual refreshing, although that hope may not have been realized. Our invitation extends to all, from the minister in his study down to the humblest parishioner. Let us take stock together of our spiritual condition and see whether, with God's help, it cannot be bettered. During the last year, there have been many notable revivals. If any of these waves of spiritual uplift have touched your district, you can tell us of the result. Have the churches increased in membership? Do their converts stand? Have the congregations been stirred to new spiritual activity? Are they doing more than before towards spreading the Gospel at home and abroad? Are the lambs of the flock shepherded? Are the churches taking care of their poor?

All these years, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has stood for the old religion. It has an unshakable faith in the continued progress and ultimate triumph of the Gospel. It looks forward confidently to a great "stirring of the dry bones" this year, as a rebuke to those who have belittled and misrepresented—or misunderstood—the churches and their work. You can aid in bringing about this result by sending us an account of your own church and its religious experiences and present condition, on the lines indicated above. Address all letters to

CHURCH WORK
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
Bible House, New York City

We are strongly impressed with the conviction that a faithful and accurate review of church conditions, set down in simple terms, not by superficial observers on the outside, but by those who are in the church, and who are a part of its life, will be of the highest value to the great body of our Christian churches of all denominations. It will inspire and energize them to greater effort, deeper devotion, holier zeal and more Christlike living.

Heroes in Daily Life

NOT all the heroes are to be found on battlefield and quarter-deck. In the great fires in Chicago and Philadelphia on December 22 and 23, nearly fifty firemen and policemen yielded up their lives in the fearless performance of duty. For years a stockyards conflagration had been dreaded in Chicago. Fire Chief James Horan, a veteran in the ranks of those who risk their lives almost daily in the line of duty, had warned the authorities of the inadequacy of the fire-fighting appliances for such an emergency. His warning was prophetic, for twelve hours later the yards were aflame and he was leading his brave fellows when some thirty of them, himself included, met instant death under a falling wall. In Philadelphia, seventeen firemen and policemen perished while fighting a fire which is supposed to have been the work of incendiaries. Heroism in battle has been immortalized, but who shall sing of the humble heroes of the mine, of the fire-line, of the police patrol? Yet these public servants run more risk than the man at the gun. They face daily the possibilities of pain, mutilation and death itself—it is their task and they perform it faithfully. With them it is always "do or die," and if death comes they meet it as heroes should. All honor to the heroes of the fire-line! They should be kept in remembrance, and a grateful community should see to it that those whom they left dependent need never want. The least recognition they deserve is to provide bread for their sorrowing families.

A Fortunate University

JUST a week after Mr. Carnegie's gift of $11,500,000 for the foundation of a World Peace Fund, comes the announcement that his brother multimillionaire, Mr. John D. Rockefeller, has made a parting offering of $10,000,000 to the University of Chicago, which he founded some twenty-one years ago. With this last gift, which brings his benefactions to the university up to the grand total of $35,000,000, he severs his official relations with the institution. This friendly rivalry in beneficence between two of the richest men in the world will probably stir other possessors of great wealth to emulate their example. Chicago University has now a very substantial endowment. It is an institution with magnificent possibilities. In recent years, the value and orthodoxy of its theological teachings have been openly questioned. Now that the whole enterprise has been generously transferred by its founder to "the people of the West," there will be a general hope that the institution may be wisely conducted on sound, conservative lines, so that Mr. Rockefeller's desire that it may become "an increasing blessing to them and their children and to future generations" may be abundantly realized.

A Short-lived War Scare

PROMPTLY on the heels of the government's announcement of its economy programme, comes the periodical war scare. This time it has been let loose, perhaps inadvertently, by the Secretary of War, who himself raises the question whether the country is "safe from invasion." This has given the alarmists the opportunity they desired to discuss our means of defense in terms calculated to excite public opinion and to create a demand for a bigger army and navy and for an immediate strengthening of our sea-coast fortifications. President Taft, at a recent public gathering in Washington, set down his foot heavily on the "scare," when he declared that there is "not the slightest reason for such a sensation, because we are at peace with all the nations of the world and quite likely to remain so." He favored a policy of "wise military preparation," but declared that he would never consent to the maintenance of a huge standing army, on the scale of the armies of Europe. Several thousand miles of ocean on either coast are our best safeguard and an effective discouragement to invasion projects. He believed in a good, efficient navy for seaboard protection—a navy strong enough to guard our coasts and to patrol the Panama Canal and maintain its integrity as an open highway for the world's commerce. This seems to fairly represent the sentiment of the country. Even the Pacific Slope, through its representatives, takes a conservative stand upon the question and disapproves of the wild idea of a standing army big enough to patrol 20,000 miles of coast line. We have probably heard the last of the war scare for some time to come.

A Book for All Classes

I received the beautiful picture of Mona Lisa and the portrait of Dr. Klopsch, for which please accept my sincere thanks. The Life-Work of Louis Klopsch came next day, which I find very interesting, so much so that I wish every one to read it. I shall loan it to our neighbors and shall try to have them subscribe for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It seems to interest all classes of people. E. A. M.

General Notes

—THE EFFORT made by Rev. G. W. Pepper and several others to change the name of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America to "The Holy Catholic Church," met with overwhelming defeat, as it deserved. It was voted down almost unanimously at a great meeting of clergy and laity in New York, December 16.

—THE DISASTROUS explosion of gas tanks in a "power-house" in New York, which caused the loss of a number of lives, emphasizes the danger of having such places in the centre of populous districts. Had it happened an hour later, hundreds of lives would probably have been sacrificed. Plants of this sort should be in places as remote as possible from crowded districts, and especially from hospitals, schools and dwellings.

Giants in These Days

WHAT the elephants are to the rest of the four-footed members of the animal kingdom, the inhabitants of a certain district of Kashmir are to the rest of mankind. They are really modern giants. They range from seven to nearly nine feet in height, and are fairly well proportioned. Perhaps the size of their feet and hands are the most impressive thing about them. Fortunately there is no need of gloves in their country and the native foot-covering is easily made. The Englishman standing between the giants is not a diminutive individual in his home land. He is about five feet nine, a small boy in size compared with his altitudinous friends. While these giants are imposing in appearance, they are far from strong, and it is said that one determined man of a shorter race can command them easily. Their nervous systems are also weak, and it is said that they are easily moved to tears. Once a regiment was formed of these imposing individuals, but they were for show only, as a small wiry Bengal lancer was a match for several if he wished to pick a quarrel with them. Frederick the Great of Prussia once formed a regiment of the tallest men he could find all over Europe. These, however, were as good fighters as the warlike monarch could wish for. Napoleon, though short, liked tall men, and he was very proud of some of his grenadiers, to whose shoulders he had to reach up when he wished to pat them on the back. While bodily health and force are necessary to success, the height or weight of the body cuts very little figure in earthly conquest. Real greatness is that of mind and heart. Some who have been small in stature have been most successful in the realm of science, literature, art and war. The late Mr. Harriman, with his little body, was the greatest railroad-builder in the world; and Carnegie, the small ironmaster, stands well toward the top among the financiers of the world. The Japanese have little bodies but great minds and courage, and treated as playthings the giants of Russia. The prizes of life are given to those who have physical force, intellectual energy, moral courage and spiritual power. These are the real giants. The giants of Kashmir in our time remind us of those mentioned in the earlier history of the race.

There were giants in the earth in those days. (Gen. 6:4.)

A Premium Against Preaching

Mrs. Helen Stone, who died at the age of eighty in Riverhead, L. I., the other day, left a farm worth about $10,000 to Thomas Gilbert Osborne, seventeen years old, her great-nephew, upon the condition that he should not enter the ministry. She was the sister of the Rev. Thomas Gilbert Osborne, a Methodist clergyman, and was a faithful member of that church herself. It is claimed that she thought the Methodist ministry was so migratory that one in that profession would never care to settle down and take care of the farm which she left by will. The boy may not be inclined to the ministry, may feel called of God to settle down upon the farm and do his religious duty there; but should God call him into the ministry, he would be a very poor specimen of either a man or a minister, if he would permit the provisions of the will to interfere with his answer to that call.

For necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel. (I. Cor. 9:16.)

Copper in Abundance

Modern industries, and especially those of our electrical age, require enormous quantities of copper, which quantities are supplied. While the production of this metal increased by 40,000,000 pounds during the year 1910, the stock on hand was decreased by more than 75,000,000 pounds. The mines now operating or under development have enough copper ore in sight to last a hundred years, and yet most of the copper deposits of the world slumber unnoticed and untouched. Alaska, South America, Africa, Asia, have a wealth of copper undreamed of by the wildest imagination. The United States has only gotten a fair start in the production of this metal. The forests are going, wood will soon be destroyed, even the coal beds of the world will be exhausted, but God has electrical energies in reserve when the other kinds of fuel shall have been exhausted, and he has stored away the copper in the mountains, ready to harness the electrical forces to the industries of mankind. There is every likelihood that in the centuries to come, men will harness up the ocean with copper wire and fasten it to the wheels of industry and to the conveniences of civilized living. The rich metal deposits which God has made in the earth for use of man are thus referred to:

Surely there is a vein for the silver, and a place for gold where they fine it. Iron is taken out of the earth, and brass is molten out of the stone. (Job 28:1, 2.)

Sinking Islands Drowned Five Hundred

The seismographs at Washington and other points indicated severe earthquake shocks at a distance approximating that of Salvador. Sure enough, shocks that began in the early evening and continued till midnight sank a number of islands beyond Ilopango Lagoon. Island after island slipped down into the Pacific out of sight. The natives fled for safety toward the mainland, most of them taking refuge on Lagoon Island. Guns were fired, bonfires were lighted, as calls to the mainland for help. The entire population was thrown into hysterical excitement, and a mad dash for boats began, men, women and children fighting like tigers for a place in them. Old enmities between rival tribes were renewed. At one place twenty stalwart fishermen plunged after a boat filled with their enemies, and in the hand-to-hand fight that ensued every person on both sides was killed. Comparatively few if any of the islanders reached a place of safety, and at least five hundred went down with the islands into a watery grave. The people from the mainland, as they looked out on the places where the beautiful islands had rested on the bosom of the Pacific, saw nothing but the sea over them and heard its sad sighing over the dead beneath it. The earth has but a thin crust; most of it is a ball of fire. The waters of the ocean coming in contact with the fire generate gases which produce explosions, throw down mountains, swallow cities and sink islands in the depths of the ocean. These disasters in nature are a type of those convulsions which occur in human society, in which institutions are thrown down and swallowed up, and in which islands disappear. Human safety by divine protection against such calamities is expressed by the Psalmist when he says:

Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. (Ps. 46:2, 3.)

The Blue and the Gray

President Taft surprised and pleased people of all sections of the country in his appointment of Justice White, a Louisiana Democrat and Confederate veteran, to be Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court. At the annual dinner of the Southern Society of New York, given at the Waldorf Astoria the other evening, five hundred representatives from below Mason and Dixon's line cheered to the echo the reference to Mr. Taft's appointment of Justice White. Congressman-elect Martin W. Littleton, who represents Colonel Roosevelt's Oyster Bay district, made an eloquent address, reaching his peroration in his commendation of Justice White's appointment: "It has remained for a great President from Ohio and a great Judge from Louisiana to demonstrate to the world that the American Union has at last found in the highest tribunal of the world the proper place in which to erect a monument to its everlasting peace 'twixt North and South, 'twixt East and West." It has been almost fifty years since the Civil War began. Its issues have been settled for all time. The people of the South are as loyal to the Stars and Stripes as those of the North. The able statesmanship of the new South, its vigorous warfare against gambling, drinking and other evils, its enthusiastic march in the establishment of Christ's kingdom, its illustrious son worthy of this judicial honor, make the appointment of Justice White by President Taft a singularly appropriate one. The spirit of patriotism, of a common brotherhood, of a Christian brotherhood, make this expression of national fraternity peculiarly beautiful, bringing to mind these words in the epistle:

But as touching brotherly love, ye need not that I write unto you; for ye yourselves are taught of God to love one another. (I. Thes. 4:9.)

Christmas Gift for Kiddies

In the terrible power house explosion at the New York Central Railroad Station, Charles Roberts was killed while delivering a package at Fiftieth Street and Lexington Avenue. He had just gotten off his truck and was struck by a flying bolt that fractured his skull. Mrs. Roberts, who felt the force of the explosion in her home on East Forty-second Street, was searching the streets in terror for her husband, who had just left her. Just before he left the house, Roberts had given his wife a ten-dollar bill, telling her that it was his tobacco money, which he had laid away for a few months to purchase Christmas presents for the kiddies. "We must get them something that will be useful. I shall throw away no more money on tobacco; you and the children shall have it for a better use." It is a pity and shame that human carelessness should have brought such sorrow to this and other homes, but this humble man met death in the discharge of his daily duty, driving his team, serving his employers and their customers, making an honest living for his family, cherishing and impelled by the sweetest love for home, wife, and children, and with preparation for and anticipation of the Christmas joy the Babe of Bethlehem brought to the world. No hero in war or genius in art could do any better than that, nor make any more fitting entrance into the other life. It is purity of heart made by the love of the Christ child, before which the gateway of death will open into everlasting life.

Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh. (Matt. 24:44.)

Chicago's "Off the Street" Club

By Harriet Ferrill

FOUR years of contact with the world's "soiled and broken" people had made John McMurry, of Chicago, an apostle of the idea that "It costs less to save the children than to support jails and penitentiaries." So, forming a novel child's rescue scheme, he rented a room at 282 Congress Street, Chicago, and after nailing together a few dry goods boxes for furniture, put into operation his plan of child saving by prevention and education. This was eleven years ago. From three to nine P.M. every day his doors were open to the street children who were running "wild" after school, in Tilden Alley, a notorious locality near by.

The children came in slowly at first; but Mr. McMurry was not discouraged. Giving each waif a characteristic name, such as "Justice," "Love," "Conscience," "Industry," "Selfishness," and decorating them with sashes and badges, he set them to talking in dialogue. "Conscience," wearing a mirror around her neck, showed her playmates they must keep their hearts bright and clean; "Justice" weighed naughty deeds in her scales; "Industry" slapped "Laziness" on the back with a buggy whip, and "Self-Control" told "Anger" how to behave. Besides acting the noble virtues, the street gamins had the evils of life pictured for them. On the wall was the "House of Horrors" in a red frame, with a big green serpent coiled around it, showing a tragedy following intemperance. Then there was a wax head of a lad, who had lost his mind through smoking cigarettes. Diagonally across the room was suspended a long strip of red felt, called the "Path of Duty." Along this path were danger points, marked by little red, white, green, and blue lanterns, for all the world like a brakeman's signal lights, labeled "Cigarettes," "Lies," "Vice," "Covetousness," "Selfishness," and other bad qualities.

On one afternoon, the primary children acted their simple allegories on the little stage; the next afternoon, the intermediates or advanced pupils played their parts. As fast as a child learned his lesson, he was advanced by examination to a class higher, and was said to have "taken a degree." The waif who passed from the "Degree of Diggers," was struck on the back with a "Bag of Sins," and sent on his way rejoicing to the next higher degree. When he reached the third degree, the most advanced, he struggled with his little playfellows, disguised as pigs, goats, skeletons, et cetera, fighting his way through all the mean people till he arose smiling, even though a big, red poppy, labeled "Pleasure," nodded its sleepy head to him. But of "Pleasure" he had been warned to beware; so he ignored her beckoning, and smiled upon "Industry" instead.

A Sunday Afternoon Session of the "Off the Street" Club

Besides these pretty little allegorical dialogues, the children were allowed to play with pet animals and taught how to take care of plants. On "Flower Nights," over 2,000 roses, donated by some Flower Mission, were distributed to the children, with the hope that they might imbibe the purity and the innocence of the fragrant blossoms. For a similar altruistic reason, Mr. McMurry requested the good women of the churches to invite little parties of his 250 waifs at a time to their homes, in order to give the children a glimpse of a home where drunkenness and vice did not exist.

Thus, directing the street children's play and outings in the summer time and influencing their studies, the good man went on with his task of developing child character. Sometimes the task was discouraging; for while the good seeds were being sown in the club, the tares were also being sown in the home. It was hard to get a newsboy to sign the temperance pledge, when he was accustomed to see both father and mother drink. It was hard to keep a girl from singing in a saloon for pennies, when her mother beat her if she didn't. But Mr. McMurry kept right on with his work, and he now points with pride to the "fine boys and girls" who have grown up under his guidance. He tells of struggles of Danny, who was rescued from the gutter; of Annie, who forsook the ways of her wicked relatives; of Jennie, who now helps to teach in the club rooms, and of Mary, who is a respectable girl, although her own mother drinks.

In eleven years, the "Off the Street Club" has grown till it is now almost a settlement. It conducts two cooking classes a week, three manual training classes, a psychology class, a reading club, sewing, drawing, cutting, and modeling courses. It has a large gymnasium, a library of 980 volumes, a band, an orchestra, many plants and animals, a bicycle club, and a purity club, called the "Lily Club." In the Lily Club, the members agree to support one poor child a year. When the members select a certain child, Mr. McMurry holds them to their task, even if it be unpleasant. Last year, the girls of the club had a serious time with their charge, which was sent home every night clean and spotless, only to come back to the club rooms next day with her pretty clothes all soiled from sleeping at home in a bed with old coats for comforters.

The club, which now ministers to several hundreds of children, is supported by volunteer contributions. It is doing an excellent work and is deserving of unstinted support.

PHILANDER RHODES, PIONEER

A Narrative of the Indian Massacre of 1862

PHILANDER RHODES was born in New York State about the year 1800. He came of good stock and had many noble qualities; but the curse of drink laid its blight upon him in his early manhood and seemed likely to ruin him. He left home and became a wanderer. This was about 1822. He at last found himself in Fort Snelling, Minnesota, a roustabout, a drunkard. The territory of Minnesota was then wild and thinly settled, but roving bands of Indians were numerous.

Young Philander Rhodes in some way gained the love of a chief's daughter and married her. He had had a good education and in time learned to speak the Indian language so fluently that he was appointed Indian interpreter for the government, a post which he had held for thirty years when the writer became acquainted with him.

After he had been some time at Fort Snelling, a missionary, who had been preaching to the Sioux Indians, came to the fort to preach to the soldiers. At this time there were many troops stationed there.

The officers were pleased to have him come and during the winter he preached there often. Philander became serious, repented of his bad habits, and was effectually converted.

In common with other government agents, he had a large stone house for his residence, and to his home and at his table the Indians were welcome.

In the fall of 1852, there were about two thousand Sioux Indians waiting at the fort and camping on the flats of the Minnesota River, to receive their pay from the government in blankets, provisions and money.

Children had been born to Philander and his wife. White settlers were now coming in large numbers. Many of those men who had married squaws began to be ashamed of their wives and children and abandoned them.

Philander was urged to do the same thing and leave his family. He considered the matter seriously, but came to the conclusion that as he had taken his wife in good faith, he would stand by her to the end, come what might. He educated his two eldest children in the best Eastern schools. The son did not amount to anything, but the daughter was brilliant. He built a large house near Minne-ha-ha Falls. Here his family lived for several years. The oldest son and daughter had married suitable partners. The other children remained at home.

The agency was now removed to Fort Sibley and Philander and his family settled there.

The Warning of the Massacre

In 1862, while the Rhodes family were living at Fort Sibley, the Indians secretly planned a wholesale massacre of all the white settlers.

One night Philander's wife's brother came to her at the risk of his life and told her to take her family and escape for their lives; that she must not let any outsiders know it, for he would be killed if it was found out that he had warned them.

Philander now directed his wife to take the children and escape with them by night, and he would remain and try to pacify the Indians, which he thought he could do, as he had been their best friend.

But his efforts proved futile. Seeing at last that there was no hope of preventing the outbreak, he started to seek safety. It was extremely hot weather. As he was traveling alone, he came to a lone tree on the prairie, under which were several young braves smoking their pipes. Philander greeted them and the pipe was passed around. Shortly afterward he arose to continue his journey. He had gone but a short distance when the braves shot him in the back, killing him instantly. Then they cut his head off and stuck it upon a pole.

The massacre was now on. Men, women and children were alike murdered. The most unspeakable atrocities were perpetrated; houses were rifled and their contents destroyed. Grain stacks and dwellings were burned. The settlers fled for their lives, most of them too late.

Devastation and ruin were everywhere. These sights and scenes were witnessed by the soldiers as they went to drive the Indians back. The annals of this massacre are heartrending.

Philander Rhodes had now gone to his reward. Unpromising as his youth had been, he had proved himself a noble man and a true patriot.

The squaw, the wife and mother, returned to live at the home near Minne-ha-ha. But death soon claimed her. A few sympathizing people (the writer among them) performed the last sad rites over the body of this good and faithful woman. She was never known to speak a word of English, though she understood it well. After the Indians were driven back, the body of Philander Rhodes was found and was brought back and buried; and the husband and wife now lie side by side on the banks of the "Laughing Waters" of Minne-ha-ha.

The Light-Hearted Poor of Italy

Scrap-Gatherers in the Markets

At all American ports the stringent quarantine is now being enforced against all suspects of cholera from European seaports, especially those from Italy. It has been noted that the plague is most prevalent among the poorer and more crowded sections of the Italian cities, and especially where the cost of living is abnormally high.

Nowhere in Italy is the increased cost of living more keenly felt than in Milan, and the reasons appear, for the most part, to be fictitious. The cost of flour, for instance, has increased from thirty-eight lire (a lira being a fraction over nineteen cents) per 220 pounds in 1908, to forty-five lire this year. Bread went from four-tenths of a lira per 2.2 pounds to .48 lira; sugar from 1.42 per 2.2 pounds to 1.48 lire, and milk from .23 lira per litre to .3 lira, while eggs rose from .8 lira the dozen to 1.60. The cost of butter has increased 15 per cent.; coffee 10 per cent., and vegetables 15 per cent., while fruit went up 30 per cent. The price of meat is steadily increasing, and is practically prohibitive to most people. Beef, for roasting, has risen from 2.20 lire per 2.2 pounds, in 1904, to 2.8 lire now; and so on with other articles of food. House rents, too, have advanced about 30 per cent. in the three years, so that now it is practically impossible to rent a house or an apartment for less than three years, the rent payable, even then, six months in advance, and the tenant seldom having the chance of re-renting.

What is the result among people who are cramped in poor quarters and fed upon meagre fare at famine prices? Sickness, general liability to attacks of disease are among the results. Nowhere in the world, perhaps, are there "slums" like those in the Italian cities. They are high tenements of narrow brick, coated over with a concrete of pink and yellow and white. In among the narrow little alley-ways which here and there turn to steps of stone, tired women saunter, carrying huge oil jars, such as one may see among the relics of Pompeii preserved in some museum. Children, too, are running hither and thither, watching for the least sign of opulence in the passerby, that they may flock about him, begging for a coin—a centissimo. A woman's voice comes down from some upper floor in belated warning, and a swinging bucket or a tin pail imperils the head of the passerby, for this is the popular means of transporting things to the upper floors of these tenements. A bucket and string, sometimes a pulley, these constitute the tenement elevator. Dirty, brown-skinned children with tangled chestnut hair, playing among the balconies. Cheaply-built horse-cars, needing no track, trundle by, filled with men wearing the Garibaldi caps, and all of them smoking. Banana peddlers saunter by, stopping at the doors of dingy shops, where the entire family of the shopkeeper is gathered. You peep inside and shudder at the bed and the floor. Yet here both bread and meat are sold.

In the depths of the slums you find second-hand dealers, whose wares hang from poles along the outer edge of the walk. Every one walks in the street, and the pavements are given over to the exposition of wares. Candle-stores are everywhere, for the Italian poor are most religious. A penny saved is invested in a taper to be burned at some neighboring shrine.

At every window, high as the tenements reach, up to the rift of the soft, blue Italian sky, one sees hanging great golden gourds that are filled with lard or with milk or water. These are the refrigerators of the south of Europe, without which the poor would perish. Peddlers and beggars throng the streets, with here and there among them a hired nurse. On Sundays, when the signora herself takes care of the infant, the nurse comes home. She wears no cap, but upon her head there is a great bow of yellow or red ribbon, with long ends hanging down behind. Little brass bells jingle merrily on the ribbons.

Down at the harbor, the boys fish when there is no other amusement. Many a neat fry is brought home for the family table. Others sell newspapers. Let a street-organ go by, however, and customers may go to the winds. Here and there, the older boys linger about the tables of some sidewalk café, where men are playing cards.

As we go on the tenements seem to be growing higher. Six and seven stories they tower now and we can no longer count the balconies. There is a central court in some of the houses, where skeins of yarn are drying and where peddlers deposit their stalls while they call to the householders. In some of these courts an altar is set up. If we are fortunate, we may chance to see a wedding. The bride and groom have come from the church to the family altar, as it were, and there is a great hubbub; for all the people of the tenements gather to see the ceremony. In the maze of lanes, there are stalls without number—some with boiled sago, the roasted peel of the mango, and that dish of the very poor, the roasted pine-cone. Now we come to a market filled with little stalls, with goods suspended from poles, and with gaily-robed vendors. Down at the street-fountain nearby are women wearing on their heads great picturesque white lace caps that fall to either side like a cushion. Some sell cakes, others bread; but none seem to care particularly whether one purchases or not. Yonder is a peddler with a great jug of water on his back, and a tray with glasses in his hand. He is selling drinking water at a cent a glass. Another itinerant carries a tray of fruit on his head, loaded with green bananas, oranges, lemons and tangerines. Then there is the fan-peddler, the post-card seller, the boy with strings of onions round his neck, and the bright-eyed cherry peddler with his basket of luscious black cherries and his scales slung over his shoulder.

The street musicians of the slums are playing airs from Cavalleria Rusticana. The violins take up other Italian melodies and the girls in the balconies burst out with their songs. One who has walked these tenement alleys, when the girls are singing in the balconies, will be loath to leave. The streets are often so narrow that two carts cannot pass each other, yet the drivers will venture in. Hand carts with lemons and bomba are numerous, so are donkeys with panniers. Little burros are there, too, conspicuous by the tall cock-feathers rising up from their harness of gay brass trimmings. Now and then there may be a hack. A stranger will be almost literally dragged into one of these by the driver if he is spied in the slums.

With twilight safety diminishes in the slums. Strangers not in tenement attire, and lacking the accent, are soon recognized. By flinging a handful of large copper coins—the total value perhaps a dime—the crowd is easily made to scatter and the visitor may make a safe and dignified retreat.

MR. HOLT'S AMAZING OCEAN TRIP

Runs Over on the "Mauretania," Does New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, Greets Mr. Taft and Embarks Again, all in Thirty-six Hours

IT HAS long been the boast of American newspaper men that they stood at the head of the profession—in a class by themselves—in getting interviews from people usually unapproachable, and supplying news to the public at a faster pace than that achieved by the journalists of any other land under the sun. In fact, so deeply has this idea become rooted in the public mind that whenever we hear of a noteworthy journalistic achievement in another country, we feel that the man who did it must have a drop of American blood hidden somewhere in his anatomy, or else, at some time in his life, he must have served a strenuous apprenticeship under some of the city editors who have their habitat in the skyscrapers along Newspaper Row.

William R. Holt

England, however, has shown us that for hustle and perseverance she has men on her great metropolitan dailies who are equal to any connected with our great New York or Chicago publications. To tell the truth, New York newspaperdom has not quite recovered from the surprise occasioned by the flying visit of William Rugg Holt, who came and went on the remarkable "Christmas round trip" of the liner Mauretania.

The Mauretania stopped at her dock in the North River, New York, just thirty-six hours. Mr. Holt, of the London Daily Mail, in those same thirty-six hours did not stop anywhere long enough so you would find him again in any given spot if you turned your back for a moment. He came to see as much of America as possible, and he saw more of it than many people who have lived here all their lives and think they have been about a little.

Lord Northcliffe, who owns more first-class newspapers and publications than any one else in the world, sent him over to show us what an English newspaper man can do. Lord Northcliffe's permanent representative in New York made elaborate preparations, which went through without a hitch, and Mr. Holt was shot from one interview to another, from city to city, with a rapidity which made the eyes of the American reporters, who were hot on his trail, bulge with astonishment. Mr. Holt landed in Washington in the morning, at about the same time some of the passengers back on the Mauretania were leaving the ship. He was taken to the White House and, after a short delay, was received by President Taft. He says Mr. Taft has a powerful handshake which his fingers will remember for some time to come. He was much pleased with his interview and stayed long enough to see the President receive a Congressman and his bride and a delegation of Washington business men. The informality of it all amazed him, but he confessed that he liked the way our statesmen do things, especially their accessibility to the public.

Later he was taken to the Capitol, and saw Speaker Cannon and other "big guns" of the lawmaking body. Soon he was in a private car bound for Baltimore. He did that city in an automobile, which sometimes reduced its speed until it was on all four wheels, and then raced for the station. Then he took a tour of Philadelphia, seeing among other things the hall where the Declaration was made, an object of interest to all visiting Englishmen as well as Americans.

On the last lap of his journey to New York, he dictated an article for his home papers to be cabled at once to London. He went all over New York; saw the Mayor, had a talk with Governor-elect Dix, and then tried the subway at a rush hour and escaped alive to tell his experiences. He tried a ride under the Hudson and back; saw the skyscrapers, and shopped in the department stores and got a few hours' sleep at night. He was surprised to find what a furor he created and was compelled to submit to numberless interviews from accompanying reporters. At six o'clock Saturday evening he was on the deck of the Mauretania, waving good-by with unusual English cordiality to a score of new-found friends among his fellow craftsmen of the press of New York. Perhaps he won't write a book, but his experiences as they will appear in the London papers will be good reading for Briton and American.

It was a wonderful trip the giant Mauretania made in the effort to steam from Fishguard, in Wales, to New York, unload, coal and load and reach Fishguard again all within the space of eleven days. Several passengers took the round trip to be able to say that "they were there."

The steamer brought a large cabin list and her many decks were filled with tons of Christmas gifts from the old country and wagon-loads of Christmas mail.

Both continents watched the wonderful race against the white crests of the wintry seas. Good weather did not aid the project. Over waves as high as houses the great liner plunged, sometimes piercing them, sometimes riding them. One great "comber" went over her top decks, bent the rails as if they had been tin and knocked a window out of the pilot house many feet above. A strain was on officers and crew. They felt the thrill of the great trial, and went about their work with an enthusiasm which brought many admiring remarks from the passengers, onlookers yet participants in the race to conquer space, the elements and the sea.

Captain W. F. Turner was in command. He may have slept some during the voyage, but most people were not conscious of the fact. He is proud of the fact that he "came up through the hawse pipe," as he puts it—that is, gained his present post by repeated promotion from cabin boy—and though he has been more than a generation at sea, he is slated probably to tread the quarter-deck for twenty years to come. He is as strong as he is modest about his exploits. At the last of the trip he refused to leave the bridge an instant, and what a bitter night the last one was! It made his cherry cheeks redder and he found that when morning came he would have to dispense with shaving while his cheeks got well.

At New York the health officer was ready for a quick investigation. The mail boats then came alongside and detained her some, but when she had made fast at the dock her record stood four days, twenty hours and seven minutes.

In thirty hours over five thousand tons of coal had been put aboard, the men shoveling day and night; the mail and cargo were in the hold and ready to start back. She sailed at six on Saturday, though she could have got away at noon, but kept to her return schedule on account of passengers, Mr. William Rugg Holt being among the number.

The Mauretania made a great home run, reaching Fishguard, Wales, in a little over four days and fifteen hours—the quickest on record. The round trip occupied less than twelve days, including a 36-hour stop-over in New York.

A Welcome Visitor

Many thanks for the beautiful calendars and portrait of our beloved friend, Dr. Klopsch, whose memory is to me sacred, for of all my departed friends he is held as the most sacred for the glorious work he has done for humanity, not only in New York City but in foreign lands. If ever a man devoted and gave his life, service and his funds to alleviate the suffering of humanity, Dr. Klopsch stands at the head of all. My prayer is that the same prosperity may abide and continue with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which was so near and dear to our departed brother. I received the book on his life and it has one of the foremost places in our library. I want to bear witness as one of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family, that the paper is looked for every week as one of the most welcome visitors that comes to our home. We just could not do without it. Would that every home in the land would take it and read it.

THEIR BETROTHAL

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

SHE stood beside her dressing table early in the morning, putting the last touches to her toilet, because she had an errand in town and must leave home by the first train. Once or twice she stopped, in the intervals of arranging her hair and fastening her belt, to look with an expression of rapt delight at the ring on her finger. It was a beautiful and costly thing, a sapphire reflecting heaven's own blue, set in a circlet of flashing diamonds. The little room was plain and the house throughout very simply furnished, although there was store of old mahogany, and the pictures on the walls might have been sold for a goodly sum if Katherine Lefferts and her mother could have made up their minds to part with them for mere money. They represented to them the life-work of the artist's soul of him who had been, not so many years before, the pride and glory of that household. Had Hugh Lefferts lived longer, he would have won an enduring fame. As it was, while he lived the fruits of his genius kept want from his wife and daughter, and he had been able to make for them some little provision that they regarded as an independence.

Katherine had inherited a fair share of her father's working talent without that rare endowment of genius that had been his. In her studio, under the attic roof, she spent many daylight hours, and orders for the miniatures that she painted were seldom lacking. In the last two years she had received continual encouragement and had raised her prices, having reached the place where her name counted for something with those who purchased.

Only last evening had Herman Dean placed on her finger the ring that was the token of their betrothal. He had meant to give it to her in holiday week, but though he had reached his thirtieth birthday there was so much of the boy in him that when the ring was in his pocket he could not wait, and so Katherine had it a whole week earlier than he had meant she should. She gazed at the precious stones with a flushing cheek and a glad smile, and kissed the sapphire before, carrying her hat and wrap over her arm, she ran downstairs to breakfast.

There was snow on the ground and the walk to the station was a good half mile. Her mother tied a thin green veil for the girl, after she had put on her hat. "I wish I did not have to wear it," Katherine said, "but the snow is dazzling, mother, and it blinds me almost as much as the gray mist does when we have that. I wonder what ails my eyes, anyway. They look as they ought, but I must admit that they are not serving me very well. That miniature of Mrs. Ogletree gave me a lot of trouble, and my eyes have ached ever since I finished it. I have all sorts of lights confusing me this morning—blue and green and red—and sometimes there is a rainbow effect like the colors in a prism. I hope Dr. Steele will change my glasses. They must be wrong or I would not be so bothered."

"Don't you want me to go with you, Katherine?" asked the mother anxiously. "Is it safe for you to go by yourself with the motor cars dashing everywhere, and the crowds and the confusion of these busy days? I can be ready in half a minute. I believe I will go with you."

"No, darling, it is not necessary. I see perfectly well to get about, and I am sure there is nothing to be worried over. Herman will meet me after I leave Dr. Steele's, and we shall lunch together and then go to hear some music. We'll both be home to dinner at six. Good-by, dear."

The mother watched Katherine as with quick, light steps she took her way to the station. The mother's heart was heavy, and the tears of apprehension rushed to her eyes, for there had lately crept over her a fear that Katherine was not to go on much longer with the work she loved. Those beautiful, near-sighted eyes, so brave and cheery, had, the mother thought, been overtasked, and with love's quick insight she divined that the blurring, the mingling lights and the pain were danger signals. She had much to do that day, and she set about her work knowing that work is the best panacea for most heart-aches. She was, day by day, arranging the house for a little house party, when the engagement of her daughter would be announced. There was a dainty dinner to be planned also for Katherine and Herman, in honor of their betrothal, and to this the minister and his wife and Katherine's dearest chum in the village were coming as guests.

Meanwhile, at the oculist's, Katherine was undergoing the accustomed tests that she more and more dreaded. She never could do herself credit when it came to reading the lines of Dr. Steele's trial cards, and when she stepped into his dark room, and he turned on her eyes the searchlights that revealed so much to his practised scrutiny, she inwardly shrank from hearing his verdict.

"'I am not going to give you up now, said Herman, lifting her hand to his lips"

"Miss Lefferts," he said, when the examination was finished, "I am sorry to tell you what I must, but the truth is kindest. If you wish other advice, by all means seek it; but I must say that I am convinced that any other professional opinion that you could obtain would be precisely like mine, identical in fact. You must stop painting miniatures. You must abandon all close work from this time forward, all handling of brushes and colors, and everything that has to do with the life of an artist, if you would retain your present sight. Only by constant rest and the greatest care, by keeping your general health at the highest level, living much out of doors and having long, restful nights of sleep, can you avoid the total eclipse of sight."

Katherine heard the verdict of Dr. Steele with an unmoved countenance, except that she grew for an instant very pale. She thanked him for his plainness, and went away as she had done before many times, with a "Good morning, doctor," that had in it no tremulous note. "She is splendid," the doctor thought, as he opened the door for the patient who had the next appointment; "splendid! how I wish science could help her! but there is nothing hopeful in the case."

Herman Dean met her, as she had expected, in a print-shop on Fourth Avenue. They went together to luncheon and then to the concert. Katherine made an effort to appear as usual in the restaurant, but Herman looked at her with solicitude, for love is not easily deceived, and this was not the same girl to whom he had said good-night after he had slipped the sapphire ring on her finger the night before.

"Have you a headache, dear?" he said, when they were seated in the train at last. "No," she answered, "I am just a bit tired. Wait until our friends have gone this evening, and I will tell you what is the matter." Dinner was served at six, and by nine the guests had taken leave. There was still an hour before Herman must start for the train, and Mrs. Lefferts retired that the two might have that hour by themselves. Herman crossed the little drawing-room and took Katherine in his arms, kissing her hair and her lips with a lover's reverence. "Now, sweetheart," he said, "tell me what has been troubling you to-day."

"Only this," she replied, trying to be tranquil. "I must give you back your ring, Herman. I cannot marry you, or anybody."

"Cannot marry me!" exclaimed Herman in amazement. "I would like to know why. What has happened since last evening to make you say so preposterous a thing? Why, Katherine, you and I have been engaged for the last six months, and we are going to be married at Easter. What has happened, dear? No, don't remove that ring. It was put on your hand to stay."

"Herman," Katherine said, "I had an appointment, as you know, with Dr. Steele before I saw you this morning, and although he did not tell me precisely what I am about to tell you, that is, in blunt, brusque, hard truth, I knew what he meant. I am never to paint any more miniatures, or any pictures, and I must give up for all time the work that I have learned to do and to love. I shall not be able to help dear mother, and I don't quite see what she will do with a blind daughter; for as sure as I sit here, one of these days I'm going to be blind."

Herman took her hand in his and lifted it to his lips. "I wish Dr. Steele had been able to give you hope," he said, "but so long as I have eyes and hands and a brain, after all we shall manage pretty well. If you cannot paint miniatures, why should you? I am not going to give you up now, nor to be disappointed in having my wife for my comrade in the years that are coming. You belong to me, dear, and the bond cannot be broken."

They bade each other good-night, and the sapphire remained, a token of her lover's adoration, on Katherine's hand.

Instead of waiting for an Easter wedding, as had been their first intention, the two were married in less than a week. Herman had talked with Mrs. Lefferts, and soon after the wedding he carried his bride to stay a while amid the roses and lilies under the warm skies of Florida. When they came home to the mother there began for them a life of joy and hope and happiness, and although Katherine's sight was never altogether undimmed, it was, as Herman had predicted, always clear enough to see his face, and in later days clear enough to make the sunshine of the little children God gave them to bless their home.

Synopsis of Previous Chapters

Little Jimmy Preston, aged six, gets a letter at the post office for his sister Barbara. On the way home it is lost. Barbara Preston has been trying to keep the farm, the last of her father's estate, for Jimmy, but it is mortgaged to Honorable Stephen Jarvis, who is comparatively young. He threatens to foreclose. Peg Morrison, the old farm hand, is as greatly concerned over the loss of the letter as is Barbara. She goes to Mr. Jarvis to ask for more time on the mortgage. He tells her that he is disposed to do it, and also that he is tired of his present housekeeper and would like her to fill the place. She leaves without a word. The old housekeeper at once becomes her enemy. Stephen Jarvis comes to see Barbara. He asks her to marry him and he will give her the place. She refuses. She thinks of her old lover who went away and whose fate she did not know. Jarvis drives up and insists she ride with him. He rebukes her for not asking his aid to obtain a school position he heard that she had applied for, and she tells him that she asked his aid once and was refused. He says that he had offered her another place. He renews his proposals and says her brother could live with them. He tells her that he has never loved any one else in his life. He leaves her at her own gate, where little Jimmy meets her and says Peg has found the letter. All she can make out is the post-mark. The handwriting is that of David Whitcomb, her old lover, whom she thought dead. Barbara writes to the address, Tombstone, Ariz. Jarvis meets her once more and walks with her, as she will not enter the carriage; and he tells her that he cannot give her up. He grasps her arm, but with the declaration that she is "free," she wrenches away. She makes a desperate resolution. Going to Mr. Bellows, the auctioneer, she tells him that she wishes to sell her skill and intelligence "to the highest bidder." She says a mortage on the place covers everything, and that she must sell her work for a term of years for $1,200. Against his will, he consents to auction her off. Jarvis is astonished when he finds Barbara is to sell her services. A small crowd gathers at the Preston farm on the day appointed, Mr. Bellows wishes to know if Barbara wants to "back out." She refuses to change her mind. Jarvis comes to protest. Whitcomb returns while the auction is in progress. $1,400 is bid. A man giving the name of Smith secures her services for $4,000. Whitcomb in anger demands who the bidder is, but cannot find out. Bellows says Barbara is to stay at the farm until called for but will not tell the name of the buyer for whom Smith acted. She hires Martha Cottle to come and keep house while she is away. She pays Jarvis his money. Whitcomb comes to see her. She finds him changed. He urges her to marry him, but she tells him she must keep to the contract. Martha Cottle asks her if that is the man who has purchased her. Barbara wonders if the woman has been eavesdropping. Months pass, still Barbara is kept in suspense. Whitcomb again urges her to marry him; she tells him they must await result of contract. Martha Cottle tells Peg Morrison Barbara is engaged to Whitcomb. Peg asks her how she knows and she tells him she has "overheard 'em spooning." Whitcomb is at breakfast in the Barford Eagle.

THE waitress at the Barford Eagle was a pretty girl with curly light hair and wide open eyes of an innocent babyish blue.

"Here's your toast, Mr. Whitcomb, nice an' hot—jus' as you like it," she said, reaching over his shoulder to set a covered plate before him.

"An' I tried the coffee m'self this morning. That ol' cook, she makes me good and tired! She don't care whether you like things or not."

David flashed a brilliant smile at the waitress.

"You're a nice little girl, Jennie," he said, and tasted the steaming cup which she handed him. Then he made a wry face.

"Isn't it good?" asked the girl, with a grieved droop of her full red lips. "I made it jus's you said; with the egg an' all, an' it jus' boiled up good once. I stood right over it for all o' that nasty Sarah. She swatted me with her dish towel, 'cause I wouldn't——"

"It's made well enough," interrupted David; "but it's a cheap brand of coffee, and—bring the coffee-pot here, will you?"

"The coffee-pot?"

"Yes, bring it here; the one you made my coffee in."

The girl disappeared kitchenward with a hasty rustling of her crisp blue gingham skirts. David leaned back in his chair and thrust both hands in his trousers' pockets while he eyed the table service of coarse crockery and cheap glass with a cynical smile. Three or four flies hovered aimlessly about the plate of buttered toast, and one crawled into the half-filled cream jar, where it buzzed helplessly, its wings spattered with the liquid.

"My!" muttered David, pushing back his chair and yawning. There were shrill voices in loud altercation in the not distant kitchen, the sound of a hard-shut door, and the waitress reappeared, red-cheeked and breathless, bearing a large black coffee-pot in her two hands held far in front of her.

"Here it is, Mr. Whitcomb," she said. "That nasty ol' cook was bound I shouldn't bring it in 'ere. She threw dish-water on my clean apron. I could 'a killed her!"

She held the coffee-pot for his inspection and David lifted the lid, peered in, and sniffed disgustedly.

"Ugh!" he said, "I thought so. Now, I like decent coffee, and I'll buy a coffee-pot just to make my coffee in. Do you suppose you could keep it so that termagant in the kitchen wouldn't annex it?"

"David whipped out a yellow-backed bill from his vest pocket"

"You bet I can," giggled the girl delightedly, "an' I'll do it, too, jus' to spite Sarah. An' I'll make your coffee every morning. I'd love to, Mr. Whitcomb."

"Good girl," drawled David. He waved his hand toward the table. "You may as well take these things away," he said, "I'm—er—not hungry this morning."

The girl's face fell; her full lips quivered and pouted like a child's on the verge of sobbing.

"I made the toast," she said. "I made it jus' like you said. It—it's good."

David uncovered the plate hastily.

"It looks fine, Jennie; but you see it's so near dinner time—see here, my girl, you buy the coffee-pot for me; will you?—just a plain tin one, mind. And—er—keep the change."

He threw a crisp bill on the table.

The girl took up the money and folded it together carefully. When she raised her blue eyes, they were swimming in tears.

"I—I'll do anythin' you say," she whimpered, "anythin' you want me to."

By way of answer, perhaps, David pushed back his chair with a harsh scraping sound that echoed dismally through the empty room. Then he rose, clapped his straw hat on the back of his curly head, searched for his cigarette case and matches and stalked out to the piazza by way of the passage which, in country fashion, afforded an easy mode of transit between the bar and the dining-room. At one side of the passage was set a high ink-spattered desk and behind it a long-legged stool upon which perched a fattish elderly man intent upon a ledger. This individual appeared to feel the heat of the June morning exceedingly, for he mopped his face from time to time with a large handkerchief, in the intervals of setting down laborious lines of figures. He looked up as David Whitcomb approached and his large face creased itself into a dubious smile.

"Good-morning, Sutton," remarked David blandly. "Finding out how much the public owes you for your astonishing good cheer—eh?"

"Mornin', Mr. Whitcomb," mumbled the Boniface. "Um—yes; I was sort of goin' over m' books. Warm mornin', ain't it?"

He eyed David closely, taking note apparently of the heavy ring of virgin gold on the finger of his left hand and descending slyly to the polished toes of his tan Oxfords.

"How much do I owe you?" asked the young man nonchalantly, allowing a thin wreath of smoke to escape from his lips.

"T'won't break ye, I guess," hazarded Mr. Sutton, pushing a slip of pink paper across the desk with alacrity. "The's a few extrys on this week's bill," he added, breathing heavily as he indicated with the handle of his pen various items annotated on the account.

David flung his half-smoked cigarette out of the open window, and produced a roll of bills from his pocket, from which he detached one.

"Take it out of that," he said carelessly. "I need some change."

"Yes, sir; all right, sir. Thank you, sir," said Mr. Sutton effusively.

He sucked in his lips in a windy whisper as he counted out the change in bills of smaller denominations and topped them with a little pile of silver.

"Hope you find everythin' t' your likin' at the Eagle."

David shrugged his shoulders.

"Oh, it's all right," he said. "I'm used to roughing it."

The hotel keeper signed his name to the receipted bill with a heavy flourish.

"Heh!" he ejaculated.

Then he climbed hastily down from his perch.

"Come across," he said hospitably, "an' have one on me. Anythin' you say, Mr. Whitcomb."

"Something cold, if you have it," David directed the bartender, "and bitter. No, no! not too much of that. Fill it up with water."

He drank thirstily and set down the glass, lifting his eyes to look out of the window at a passing vehicle.

"That's the Hon'rable S. Jarvis, Esquire," pronounced his host, sucking his lips over the contents of his own glass. "Warm man, Jarvis."

"By that you mean?" queried David, strolling toward the door.

"He's got the rocks, Jarvis has; but my! ain't he the screechin' limit? I'll bet you——"

Mr. Sutton waddled heavily after David, and seated himself comfortably in one of the big splint-bottomed chairs ranged along the piazza for the convenience of patrons.

"I'll bet you," he concluded, "he's got half a million salted down, if he's got a penny."

"Is there a decent horse in the stable?" inquired David, after a silence, which Mr. Sutton filled in with various animal-like noises, expressive of his entire physical comfort.

"No; but I c'n git y' one over to the livery stable. I'll send over for it, if you say so," Mr. Sutton responded.

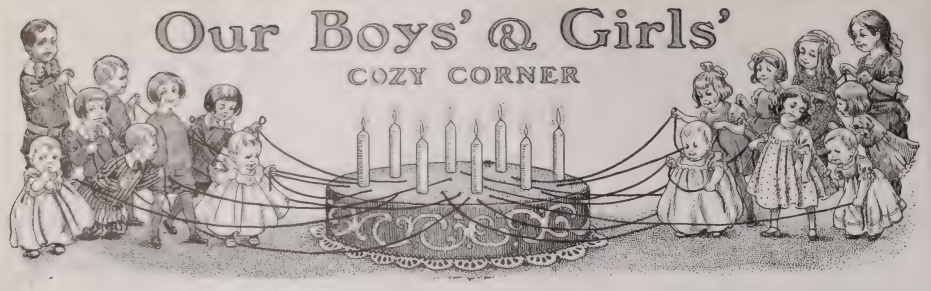
"I want to find Bellows," David said.

"Who? The auctioneer? Wall, y' don't need no livery hoss t' locate Thomas. He's over t' Henry Maclin's this mornin', sellin' out the stock. Hank's concluded to go West. Thinks there's more doin' out there. But I dunno 'bout that. You mus' know somethin' 'bout the West?"

David was smoking a second cigarette with short, impatient puffs.

"I've been there," he admitted, with a transient scowl.

"How'd you like it?" asked Mr. Sutton, folding his pudgy hands across his protuberant front. "What sort of a place is it? Gamblers—heh? Cowboys, shootin' parties, sage brush, prairie fires, etcetery—heh?"



"You've named the principal features of the great West," drawled David. "It's all there, more particularly the et cetera. There's lots of that roaming about."

He pulled his hat over his eyes and stepped down from the veranda.

"I may not be back to dinner," he said, "but I'd like a decent steak for supper, if you can get it in this centre of civilization."

Mr. Sutton watched the young man's muscular figure in its leisurely progress down the street. Then he went back to the bar-room, where his underling, a slim, sallow young man with

Twelfth Night

TWELVE days after Christ was born in Bethlehem, the wise men came bringing their gifts to the Baby King; and this is the reason we have on the sixth of January what is called the Feast of the Wise Men, or the Kings' Christmas, Epiphany, or Twelfth Night.

Down to the time of Oliver Cromwell, Twelfth Night, in the Northern countries, was an important church holiday. Wonderful old mystery and morality plays were presented in the churches and great Twelfth Night fêtes and festivals were held throughout the land.

To this day, one of the heartiest, merriest times of all the year in those same Northern countries (where even tiniest boys and girls go away to boarding school), is the hearty, happy celebrating of Twelfth Night. "Holidays are ended," the home folks seem to say; "for the children's sake we must rally for a last merry-making, because, tomorrow, back they all must go to dull lessons."

Nobody pleads indifference, nor stays away; every one, from lord and master of the house to the scullery maid and the "buttons," all in fine, high spirit, join the Twelfth Night frolic.

The more fantastic and splendid the costumes (gotten up on the spur of the moment) the better. Impromptu sceptres and crowns of gold and silver paper and Christmas tree tinsel, cloaks and frocks out of trunks in the attic, Canton flannel petticoats and court trains, bordered with filligree paper, are made to look very imposing and wonderful. The King and the Queen, the Lord Mayor of London, and all the Princesses and Princes of the Royal Families, are nearly always represented in some outlandish but recognizable way. Prince Charming, Mother Goose, Cinderella, Red Ridinghood, Dick Whittington, Harlequin, and most of the good old folk-lore friends, are pretty sure to come to Twelfth Night parties.

Twelfth Night Games

A TWELFTH NIGHT King is always chosen and crowned in grandiloquent frolic and pomp. It is the King's duty to start the games and to see to it that they go off with a snap, and that everybody has a good time.

Neighbor-Neighbor, the Muffin Man, Cross-questions and Crooked Answers, Solemn Occasion, London Bridge, Pussy Wants a Corner, Follow the Leader, Round the Mulberry Bush, Frog in the Middle, How Many Miles to Babylon, Forfeits, Consequences, Clumps, and Blind Man's Buff are old Twelfth Night standbys.

Fortune-Telling

IF YOU get up a Twelfth Night frolic—and be sure you do—remember a big Fortune Cake is usually the climax of all the fun.

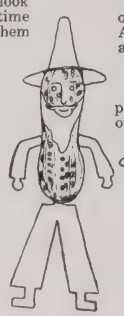
Take a large round hat-box; smear it with glue, cover it with frosting and put many candles on the lid. Fill the box with as many small scolloped cup-cakes as there are guests at the party, and in each cake put either a piece of money (for riches), a ring (for a wedding), a button (this means you will be a bachelor or an old maid), a bean (prophesies a long journey), a thimble (a poor man's bride), a big bead (a new dress), a lentil (this means you will be a minister if you are a boy or marry one if you are a girl), a cherry stone (you will marry a soldier).

What Chestnuts Tell

CHESTNUTS are oldest Twelfth Night fortune-tellers. Nearly every one knows how to tell chestnut fortunes. The principal signs are: If the chestnut burns up evenly without sputtering it is telling you that your life will be even and serene: neither very great fortune nor very much ill luck will come to you. If it sputters and flies away, you may expect riches and splendor. If it roasts quite evenly, and pops open just enough to be done to a turn, this is the best fortune of all.

When the party is over and it is time to be going home, set twelve candles in flat candlesticks up on the floor, about one yard apart, and name them for the twelve calendar months. Let each girl in her hat and cloak gather her skirts tight about her, and hop lightly over the twelve candle flames without stopping. At the end of the journey, the candles that have blown out as she passed over them, mark the only months in the year in which she may expect disappointment. This is an old Candlemas game, and sometimes Twelfth Night is called Candlemas.

For the Little Folk



"NO sunshine out of doors to-day, so we must make plenty of sunshine in the house," Mother would say to us little folk when the day promised to be dull and gray, and often we had already planned for some special out-of-door frolic. These splendid rainy nursery days are so full of sunshine as I look back at them, that I intend from time to time to tell you very little folk about some of them right here in the Cozy Corner.

Have you ever played peanuts? If you have not, then the very next dull day that it rains and you wonder what to do next, run as fast as ever you can, or get some one to do it for you, to the nearest peanut stand and buy a pint of peanuts. With the help of some bits of paper, your box of paints, and some wooden toothpicks, there is almost no measuring the fun that you can have with just a pint of peanuts.

This is enough of a suggestion for you clever little folk. I need not go very much farther into particulars, except perhaps to say that the animals and paper cut-outs that I am showing you here are in pretty good scale for the average peanut animal.

Once you start to play with peanuts, you are pretty sure to discover the enchantment that is in the game. Rabbits, chickens, lobsters and queerest fish, butterflies, hornets, giraffes, monkeys with long tails and ever so many more animals and insects, will start out at you asking for arms and legs and a head. A whole circus parade indeed, and all little boys and girls that follow after, was often the happy outcome of one single rainy day in the old nursery home, and a pint of peanuts.

To make the peanut people stand up properly, as of course they should, set each one on a little bit of melted sealing wax and make plenty babies with caps and capes.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS: Do be sure to get up a Twelfth Night Party. You cannot imagine the fun there is in one until you try it out. Play peanuts too, and do not fail to enter the SPECIAL JANUARY PRIZE CONTEST.

TO THE HIGHEST BIDDER

ily black hair parted very particularly n the middle of his narrow head, was anguidly arranging clean glasses on a ray.

"He's hot stuff; ain't he?" observed he bar-tender.

"Who, Whitcomb?"

"Thinks he's the whole thing; don't e?"

Mr. Sutton frowned. "I ain't made p my mind 'bout that young feller," e said ponderously. "But I'm kind of atchin' him. It strikes me he'll bear —watchin'."

David Whitcomb, walking slowly own the village street under the shade f the spreading maples, was experiencing that vague dissatisfaction hich in individuals of his temperament is apt to follow the attainment of ome hotly pursued desire. Barbara ad long represented to his imagination the distant, unscaled peak, the unrodden wild, the unstaked, unexplored laim. He had come back from the Vest with no very fixed intention of arrying her; but with something of he languid curiosity the traveler feels egarding scenes long unvisited.

He had not felt at all sure that he ould find Barbara the lovely vision hat he had pictured her in the infrequent intervals given to a vague remembrance of past days. But he had ost sight of his indifference in the excitement of the auction and his subsequent impulsive endeavors to break own the girl's scruples. Now he had von her, fairly or unfairly, and he was hinking with some irritation of the uture to which he had committed himelf. The dull vista of a married life, pent in hard work on a farm which in he end could not belong to him, appeared more and more intolerable the onger he dwelt upon it. He was in a horoughly bad humor by the time he ad reached the scene of Thomas Bellows' latest activities.

Henry Maclin's hardware, flour and eed store was situated on the outskirts of the village. As David approached it he could hear the loud voice f the auctioneer upraised in the raucous monotone of his calling, and the ull thud of his hammer, as he proclaimed the sale of the various articles n assistant was rapidly passing up to im.

David sauntered up to the edge of he crowd and stood there, gloomily eviewing the events of the previous nonth. He glanced up suddenly to nd a keen pair of eyes riveted upon im.

"Mornin', Mr. Whitcomb," called Peg Morrison, as if he feared the young an might attempt to avoid him. Thinkin' o' biddin' in any o' the stuff? 'he best of it's gone b' now. I got a ood cross-cut saw, though. B'en vantin' one fer quite a spell. The's uite a lot o' dead timber standin' on h' farm in diff'rent places 'at ought t' ome down."

David was plainly indifferent, and fter cautiously studying his unresponsive face Mr. Morrison went on.

"Miss Barb'ry, she leaves mos' evrythin' t' me; but th's times when I eel as 'o I'd like a man t' go over the lace with me. Course she's got her lees, an' some o' 'em's all right; but I 'clar' I hate t' see her botherin' with utdoor work. Females had ought to eep house an' sew an' look after the ookin', an' not be tryin' t' do men's vork b'sides. That's what I tell her, n' I been thinkin' 'at some day you'd o 'round with me, since you're such a ood friend o' Miss Barb'ry's."

David frowned in an irritated fashon.

"I don't understand farming, my ood fellow," he said coldly. "So I'm fraid my advice wouldn't prove very aluable."

"That's jus' what I was thinkin'," as Peg's incautious comment. "An' mebbe fer tl ery reason, you'd better——"

He hesitated and stopped short under the steady stare of Whitcomb's blue eyes.

"Y'—see," he blundered on, "if Miss Barb'ry hes to go 'way fer five years, I was thinkin'——"

"She won't go away for five years, if I can help it," said David. "I'm going to try and get her out of the mess she's made of things."

His eyes wrinkled at the corners and he laughed outright at the strange working of Peg's untutored features.

"Don't you bother your old head about Miss Barbara's affairs," he said carelessly, "nor mine."

He turned decidedly and made his way towards Bellows, who had just disposed of the last lot of merchandise, and stepped down from his perch among the rapidly dispersing crowd.

But the auctioneer could not, when questioned, furnish the address of the small man in checked clothes who had paid four thousand dollars for a hypothetical term of Barbara's service. He shook his head vigorously when urged to a further explanation of what had immediately followed the event at the Preston farm.

"Nop," he persisted. "I can't help you none. I done all I was paid t' do an'——"

David whipped out a yellow-backed bill from his vest pocket.

"You had references," he said in a cautious tone, "for I heard you say so. Who figured as referee?"

Mr. Bellows waved David's hand aside.

"It'd cost me more'n you've got t' tell you," he said. "Nop. I ain't a-goin' t' say nothin' more. Anyway, what business is it of yours?"

David did not choose to acquaint the auctioneer with the reasons for his anxiety, and presently he found himself walking swiftly along the road leading to the Preston farm. He was uncomfortably hungry by this time, but with the unreason of the average man attributed his gloomy feelings to a higher source than his clamorous stomach.

Barbara met him at the door with an agitated face.

"I have heard from—the person who —oh, I was hoping you would come!"

"Do you mean the fellow who bought you?" he demanded sharply. Her apparent faith in himself he passed over without notice. "Has he been here?"

"No-o," murmured Barbara; "but I had a letter."

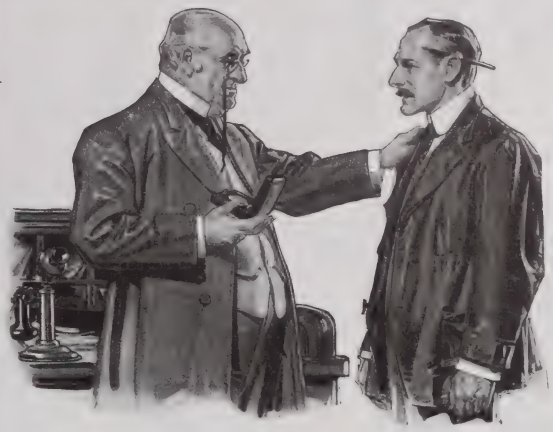
She put it into his hand, and watched him eagerly, timidly, while he read it. She had lain awake half the night, thinking of David, of his eyes, of the strong pressure of his arms, of the touch of his lips upon hers. Love had drawn near at last, and she had bent her head meekly to his accolade, almost forgetting her chain in the rapture of the moment. But with the morning had come the painful recurrence of all her doubts and fears; and later, as if in answer to her agitated questionings, the letter.

David read it with frowning brows.

"There's nothing in this," he said impatiently, "to show you who the person is, nor when you'll be called for."

"No," Barbara agreed faintly. "But you see——"

"It's some mean dog-in-the-manger, who is watching you in secret, and——"



He stopped short.

"The boy is coming," he said, and got to his feet.

"You'll stay to dinner?" she begged him timidly. "I made cherry pies this morning. I think"—humbly—"that they're very good."

David put his arm around her, with a sudden untraced impulse of tenderness.

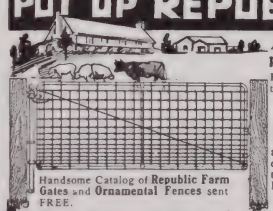
The Howard Watch

In token of faithful service there is no reward so fitting as the gift of a HOWARD WATCH.

In itself it stands for punctuality, accuracy, efficiency. It is always "on the job" and it always "makes good."

During January in nearly every bank, insurance company, railroad office factory or store, there is some man, or men, marked for special recognition.

Promotion, higher pay, are powerful incentives. They touch a man's self-interest. A HOWARD Watch touches his heart. There is a loyalty that money alone cannot measure and appreciation that no ordinary gift will express.



The HOWARD idea is more than a watch: it is a tradition. The HOWARD owner is one of a select company—a company whose membership embraces the ablest men of this country for three generations.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD Watch. Find the HOWARD jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know.

Drop us a postal card, Dept. W, and we will send you "The Story of Edward Howard and the First American Watch"—an inspiring chapter of history that every man and boy should read.

Savings and Investments

THE business prosperity of a nation cannot be so easily measured by the success of its great individual enterprises and corporations as by the savings of the small self-employer or wage-earner.

During the fiscal year closing with June, 1910, the total savings deposits in the United States were $5,678,735,379. The last reports of the Comptroller of the Currency and of the Secretary of the National Monetary Commission show that the average deposit in American savings banks is almost four times as great as the averages for Europe, Asia, Africa, Oceania, Australia, and Canada.

The average per capita is nearly six times greater in this country than in any other part of the world. One in every six of our population is a depositor in a savings bank. This vast number is accounted for by the fact that so many have deposits in more than one bank, and this for reasons explained in a former article.

The average for each savings depositor in America is $381.28. In the rest of the world the depositors number one in every eight of population and the average sum to each credit is $101.66. This includes the deposits in postal and private savings banks.

If postal banks had been in existence in the United States during the past fiscal year, it is very certain the aggregate of such savings as we are considering would be greatly increased. We are led to this belief by the fact that the figures for foreign countries show the average deposits in private savings banks at $140, and in the postal banks at $49.33. If this proportion held good in this country, it would add about one-third to the savings, making the total of $7,571,647,372. This vast sum exceeds the total bankable gold of all the business world.

When the machinery of our postal savings system is in better working order, which will be very soon, we shall explain it in detail in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. But we will say here that the workings of the new law must prove of the greatest advantage to the large and thrifty population who live too far away from the private savings banks to avail themselves of their decided benefits. Presently, when the country postmaster and the rural free delivery mail carriers are provided with government receipts of deposit that draw a small interest and are for their face value, as good as currency in any part of the country, we may expect an increase in savings that will stagger those whose knowledge of the subject has not prepared them for the result.

What to Do With Savings

The man who owns a five-dollar treasury note has just as great a monetary interest in the prosperity and continuance of the government as the man who owns a five-dollar postal receipt; and yet there is a difference and a great one. This difference is due not so much to the small income being returned as interest, as to the fact that it brings the owner of the postal receipt into closer touch with the authorities he has himself helped to create, and so makes him a better citizen by inducing him to study, for his own interest, conditions to which he was formerly indifferent.

Taking the experience of foreign nations as a basis, we have estimated that if our postal savings system had been in existence during the past fiscal year, there would have been added to the total savings of the people, and available for investment, the vast sum of $1,892,911,372.

When a man, no matter how small his earnings, has contracted the saving habit, he is in a fair way to become a business man and a capitalist. When he has reached a point where he has fifty or a hundred dollars to the good, he will have had a training, as to the importance of interest, that will make him dissatisfied with the low rate given by the government, and he will look about for a larger source of revenue, always keeping in mind that there must be an equal assurance of safety for the sum he has to invest.

As we know, the interest given by the savings banks throughout the country is nearly twice that which can be had through the postal savings, but we are assuming that a majority of the depositors in the postal savings banks will be, as now, quite out of reach of private banks; the question then is: "How can the government depositor re-invest to his advantage in another form of security?"

There are a number of regularly chartered companies in our large cities which offer a form of interest-bearing bond, the security of which is assured and the interest on which has the advantages of regularity and reasonableness.

We have already discussed mortgages at some length, and pointed out the difficulty a man with a small amount of cash would have in securing a first mortgage that would just fit in with his resources. Now, the principal business of these companies is in the placing of first mortgages; and the work they do in this way is only limited by the amount of their available cash.

The companies we are considering have provided a plan which secures to the small investor a security with all the backing of a first mortgage, and differing only in the amount of interest, this difference—about a half of one per cent—being retained by the company to meet its own expenses and earnings.

Let it be assumed that a man can set aside $10 a month, which he is anxious to invest in a way that will make the earnings worth while. In the average country community he can find no promising field for the investment of the sum named. The aggregate of such sums throughout this country is enormous, and if brought together it would be adequate to meet the needs of every mortgagor; but, as this is impossible, the companies have hit upon the reasonable and entirely feasible plan of uniting, as far as possible, these small sums into what we may call "a co-operative whole," every holder of a certificate being with every other holder a joint mortgagee.

Some of these companies are prepared to sell certificates of, say, $200, on the instalment plan; $10 being paid immediately and $10 each month till the whole sum is paid up. Interest at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum is paid semi-annually. Of course, interest is not paid on the whole $200 that has been contracted for and which will not be fully due till nineteen months after the date of contract. Interest is paid only on the sums actually paid in, and is calculated from the actual date when each payment is received.

The company demands another condition, and that is that the subscriber shall let his money remain invested and so under their control for five years.

This condition might seem hard were it not for the fact that the receipts are quite as negotiable as any other form of good bond, and will be accepted as security at banks.

To this most interesting form of investment we hope to refer again.

"Don't worry about the letter," he said magnificently. "I'll — think it over."

It was a very happy meal they ate together, in spite of the prying presence of Miss Cottle, who had assumed control of the tea-pot. There was stewed chicken, an abundance of fresh vegetables, strawberries and yellow cream, and to top off with, the cherry pie of such unexampled excellence that David forgot the unpleasant doubts which had assailed him in the morning. As he sat smoking a cigarette on the shaded porch at the conclusion of the meal it occurred to him that the farm was not, after all, so bad a place to live. His eyes wandered dreamily across the broad fields to the blue distance, and lingered there unseeingly.

Barbara came out presently and sat down at his side.

"I should be so happy," she sighed, "if——"

"Eh—what?" he roused himself to say. He reached out and patted her hand. "Why be unhappy about anything—just now?" he murmured. He smiled dreamily into her eyes. "The dinner was perfect, sweetheart; as for the reminder from your unknown, why not be thankful that 'it' contents itself with correspondence?"

Barbara turned her eyes away. An aching lump arose in her throat as if to choke her. When she finally answered him it was in a low controlled voice.

"There will be other letters—other reminders; you saw that."

David was at the moment languidly optimistic. It occurred to him to silence her grieving lips with a kiss; but he was too drowsily comfortable to move. He contented himself by again caressing her finger tips.

"Don't poison our happiness by perpetual references to something neither of us can possibly help," he murmured.

XVI

Nearly two months had elapsed since Jarvis' last visit to the Preston farm. On that occasion he had entreated Barbara not to shame him before the crowd assembled for the auction; and she had refused to listen. Then he had gone away. Something of what followed had been repeated to him. And he had since learned of the return of David Whitcomb from the West; of his spectacular part in the bidding, and of his subsequent visits to the farm.

It was of David he was thinking as he drove along the country roads on a day in early August. The fields were yellowing to the harvest and a great peace lay upon the face of Nature, veiled lightly with the long continued heat. When, therefore, he overtook the object of his thoughts walking along the dusty road with every appearance of discomfort he drew up his horse and spoke to him.

"I haven't seen you to speak with you since your return, Mr. Whitcomb," he said civilly. "Won't you get in and ride with me? I shall be glad to—talk with you."

David stared with undisguised astonishment; then a derisive gleam shone in his blue eyes.

"Why—er—certainly, Mr. Jarvis," he said, and sprang in and seated himself with cool assurance. "It wouldn't have occurred to me to ask you for a ride," he went on, "but I'm not sorry you offered to give me a lift. It's rather unpleasant walking."

Jarvis met his inquiring look gravely.

"You are making quite a stay in the East," he said. "Do you mean to settle here?"

The quick blood rose in David's face. "I haven't made up my mind," he said; "I'm—er—just looking around a bit."

Jarvis was silent, casting about in his mind for a suitable opening for what he wished to say.

David spared him the trouble. With his usual sensitiveness to the moods of his companion—a sensitiveness that at times amounted almost to divination—he looked sidewise at Jarvis, a smile wrinkling the corners of his eyes.

"I've been to see Miss Preston," he said confidentially, "at the farm."

"Yes?" Jarvis observed non-committally.

"You know Miss Preston, I believe?" said David.

Jarvis hesitated.

"I have had business relations with Miss Preston," he said coldly. He was beginning to feel an exceeding dislike of the well-dressed, smiling young man at his side.

"Yes," agreed David, shrugging his shoulders. "She's mentioned the fact to me."

Jarvis tightened his grasp on the reins after his old choleric fashion, and the mare leaped forward as if expecting the cut of the ready lash.

"I understand Miss Preston has been relieved of—her anxieties somewhat," he said evenly. "I—was glad to know it."

David's lip curled.

"Indeed!" he syllabled with a touch of insolence. "Well, I've no doubt Barbara—Miss Preston—will be duly grateful, when—er—I mention the fact of your interest in her affairs."

"You'll not mention it, I hope," Jarvis said. After a brief silence he added, "You understand me, of course."

"Well, no," drawled David; "I don't believe I do."

He looked whimsically at Jarvis, as if expecting further elucidation.

But the older man was paying strict attention to his horse, his lips set in forbidding lines.

David yielded to one of his sudden impulses.

"Of course," he burst out, "you won't care; you've got your money out of it; but Barbara is terribly unhappy."

"Ah?"

Jarvis' note of interrogation was barely audible.

"You know, I suppose, for it's become town-talk long ago, that somebody bid her in—a thundering shame I call it—and then failed to show up. She considers herself bound since she used the money—or part of it. I'd like mighty well to get hold of the person, male or female, who's skulking behind that contract—as she persists in regarding it."

"Why? What's wrong with the transaction?"

Jarvis' tone asked for information merely; but David flashed a suspicious look at him.

"Do you know anything about it?" he demanded.

"Do I—know anything about Miss Preston's affairs?" echoed Jarvis. "Isn't that a singular question for you to put to me?"

"It would be, if I hadn't run every possible scent to earth already. I want to find the fellow."

"For what purpose?" queried Jarvis, leaning forward to watch the even play of his mare's hoofs.

"I want to pay him back and free the girl. It's an outrage to hold a woman bound in this sneaking, secret fashion. It doesn't give either of us any show."

A Man Good For Something

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

WE ARE to study to-day one who is called "Good King Asa." The whole lesson might well be devoted to a study of the word "good," which is closely related to God. He is the Good One, and conversely the good one must be God-like. Every sane human being in any country and in any century may be labeled for some one of these six groups: bad, good for nothing, goody, goodish, good or good for something. A man sometimes shifts about in these groups. Indeed, the subject of our lesson went from one end of the class to the other.

A Friend in Need

"The Spirit of God came upon Azariah, the son of Oded: and he went out to meet Asa." The secret of Asa's goodness and success seems to have been that he had this good prophet as his friend and adviser. Such a friend, with Asa's own will to be good, was able to offset the bad heredity of a bad grandfather and a bad father, Rehoboam and Abijah. It is said of the latter that "he walked in all the sins of his father." That ought to be the most conclusive reason why a man should not walk in sin, that his boy will probably follow his example, even though exhorted to the contrary, as Rehoboam was exhorted to be wise and good by Solomon, in vain. Solomon's sins, in spite of his four thousand proverbs, were followed by Rehoboam, his son, and Abijah, his grandson. There is suggestion in the boy's words, as he followed his father through the snow, "Father, I step in all your tracks." So in the saloon, the boy says, "I'll take what father takes." Temperance orators rely too much on economic arguments—the fact that saloons increase crime and poverty at the cost of the taxpayer and to the injury of honest trade. But let us remember the chief inspiration of our hard-working business men is to provide comforts for their loved ones. The strongest argument, therefore, against drinking is that the man who drinks even a little beer and wine is poisoning his children's life at the source. (See Alcohol and the Human Body, by Sir Victor Conley and Dr. Mary Sturge.) Not every defective child proclaims a parent's wilful sin, but most of the blind, epileptic, idiotic, insane and still-born children are fulfilments of the Bible warning that a man's sin—especially is it true of tippling—curses his children "to the third and fourth generation."

Here is a good watchword: "A Clean Life for Christ's Sake, for My Own Sake, for the Sake of My Family, My Country and the World." Whole nations have perished, and others are now perishing because of alcoholism.

Mightier Than Heredity

"If ye seek him, he will be found of you." Azariah, God's prophet (of whom we know nothing previous to this story, except his name and his father's), brings to Asa regeneration to counteract degeneration.

"Jehovah is with you while ye are with him." God walked with Asa only when Asa walked with God. He was just coming back from a successful war that was apparently not disapproved by God, as the time for wars to cease had not yet come. In this case, Asa trusted in God as his sufficient ally, and won; but when, later in life, threatened by the king of Israel, he appealed to Ben-hadad, the pagan king of Syria, he lost the shields of

When you polish your stove, how much service does the polish give you? If it is Rising Sun, the lustre is smooth and brilliant and stands the heat of the fire. You have a handsome stove—an ornament. Always shining.
If the lustre of some inferior polish is streaky and burns off quickly, you certainly don't get what you may have just as well as not, if you will just buy Rising Sun next time. Costs you no more; 5 and 10 cents.

15 MASSIVE BOOKS "HISTORY OF ALL NATIONS" FOR ONLY 3 1/3 Cents Per Day

THESE Fifteen Massive Volumes in "THE HISTORY OF ALL NATIONS" are as far removed from dulness as Summer is from Winter. History is the most interesting and thrilling literature you can read. As you visit the great men and women who struggled before us, as you read of their wonderful careers and their successes and adversities, you will be touched as you never have been before. History is not dry nor dull nor prosaic. It is the story-life of great personalities, and to dip into a volume of "THE HISTORY OF ALL NATIONS" is to be swept along, page by page, by the irresistible charm of its style and contents. Here is the flesh and blood of history. To read and know these heroes gives you a comprehensive knowledge of life past and present, widens your opportunities, and enables you to understand and to discuss intelligently the affairs of your own and other days. You can feel the chill despair that clutches at Napoleon's heart as he listens to his death-knell thundering from Wellington's guns at Waterloo. Begin at the dawn of civilization and thread the paths down to the hour in which you live, and as the ever-changing panorama unfolds before you, you will find its every word and deed and action engrossing, fascinating, captivating, from the first chapter to the last. "THE HISTORY OF ALL NATIONS" tingles with new life. Its stories of heroes and battles, of loves and lovers, charm by their simplicity and gentleness.

Books that Should Be in Every Home
Interesting, Instructive and Valuable to All!

These Fifteen Massive Volumes entitled "The History of All Nations" we are offering at a special price in order to give all an opportunity to enjoy this interesting work. The Christian Herald, America's Greatest Magazine of Uplift and Family Helpfulness for the Refined Christian Home, has arranged for a limited number of sets of this great work that we choose to sell for little more than the cost of production. These Fifteen luxurious books are 7½ x 10 inches in size when closed; the set complete measures 28 x 10 inches. There are 5,000 pages, 64 colored maps, 338 rich, full-page illustrations. The binding is a rich, silk-finish, art-cloth, stamped in genuine gold, with the lettering in real gold on deep red panels. The type is large and clear, and the paper is an especially heavy, rough-finish stock, of a particularly beautiful texture. The illustrations (338 in all) are printed on fine coated paper as full-page inserts. Every chapter is subdivided into sections, and sub-heads divide each section. To further summarize the text, a memorandum of each paragraph is printed in bold type on the margin of every page. This permits you to locate almost any event in history at a moment's notice, and the information in most cases will fully answer your questions.

The FIFTEEN VOLUMES will be sent, you to pay freight charges, for only $1.00 DOWN, and then $1.00 A MONTH for 19 months—less than 3⅓ cents a day. If the books do not please you, return them and your money will be refunded. But act quickly, as only a few sets remain, and another edition will not be printed. The payments are so easy you will never miss them. And while you are paying for the books you are enjoying the advantages of this work. Remember, $1.00 DOWN secures the Set—then 3⅓c. a day afterward. Hundreds will take advantage of this opportunity. You should know History, and this is your chance to buy it for much less than before. Send your order quickly—only $1.00 DOWN. Do it NOW.

gold and the liberty of his kingdom because he was not keeping step with God and relying upon him. Lincoln's words in the Civil War are appropriate, "I am not asking whether God is on our side, but whether we are on God's side." The Christian citizen, however parties shift about, should stay by the principles of civic righteousness, acting with political associates who come there, in the spirit of Charles Sumner, who said, "Where principle is, there is my party."

"If ye seek him he will be found of you." This promise to Asa is similar to David's loving charge to Solomon (I. Kings 14), and is repeated by Solomon in the words, "When he said, Seek ye my face, my heart said, Thy face, Lord, will I seek." Even in pagan lands there have been "Seekers after God," as Farrar shows in his book of that name; but only in the Bible are we told of God seeking men—the heavenly Father seeking the lost son, the divine Shepherd seeking the lost sheep. "The Father seeketh such." What joy when the seeking soul and the seeking Father meet! "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." The outcast, told by his pals and his own fears there was no hope for him, held fast to that promise, saying, "I'm the 'him' that came."

"If ye forsake him he will forsake you." The awful fact of individual responsibility is here proclaimed. Since man is free to choose good, he must also be free to choose evil. God will not force himself upon him. In the tabernacle and later in the temple, a shining cloud in the holy of holies proclaimed the presence of God. But it was not seen in the last days of the temple. It is said that a voice was heard before its disappearance, saying, "Let us depart." From the inner temple of our souls, where God dwells, he may depart, and it will be silently. Hell is separation from God, and may begin in this world. Again and again we forsake God, and the Shepherd follows us with bleeding feet, "away on the mountains wild and bare," but let us beware lest we do this too often and our hearts lose all desire to return. It is only when we lose the last yearning for God, that the return path is closed.

"Without God and Without Hope"

"For a long season Israel was without the true God." The prophet, whose mission is to speak of past and future alike in order to benefit the present, turns back in thought to picture to Asa the sin and sorrow of a previous period of Jewish history, that of the Judges, when forsaking God was even more general than in the current period of the kings. The whole story of the Judges is in the three words, "Evil, distress, deliverance," repeated over and over as a refrain moving from despair to hope, and quickly back to despair again. Over and over again "they did evil in the sight of the Lord," who to chasten them back to duty allowed some enemy to put them into "distress," that they might turn to the Lord for "deliverance." Alas, how many human lives are made up of that same sad refrain, Sin, sorrow, repentance; then back again to sin. Of all the delusions of the devil, about the worst is the idea that sin brings happiness for this world at least.

A Golden Watchword

Here comes into the story our Golden Text: "Be ye strong, and let not your hands be slack; for your work shall be rewarded." Success, Asa is told by the prophet, depends on strong purpose and industry. All history, and especially biography, confirms that analysis of success. The writer of this lesson has just been reading with wonder in the Literary Digest the story of the one Arctic struggle that was worth while—not a struggle to find a useless pole, but the successful effort of the United States Signal Corps to lay the Alaskan Government telegraph line. "Almost insurmountable difficulties were conquered on land and sea as for years our men battled with the deadly cold and other perils." What strength and courage men have shown in such undertakings for earthly good! If only the main army of the Church of God could be as resolute to overcome difficulties in saving men and cities, the world would soon be righted. It is not alone in the field of action that such strength of character can be shown, as the following story proves:

A young lady who became greatly attracted to a poor shut-in invalid who was trying to help earn a living for himself and his family, told him that she wanted him to live "the gallantest, pluckiest life" possible for the sake of those who loved him. This expression became the inspiration of his life. It haunted him day and night; and when discouraged or disheartened because he could not do what others did, these words always rang in his ear, "the gallantest, pluckiest life you can."

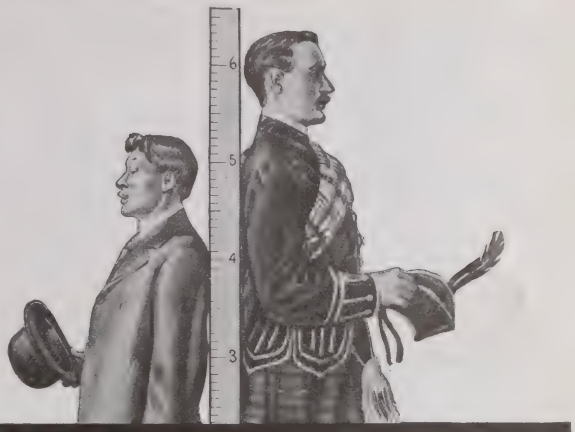
Talent Versus Energy

Says Dr. Thomas Arnold: "The difference between one boy and another is not so much in talent as in energy."

Goethe said: "The longer I live the more certain I am that the great difference between men, the great and insignificant, is energy—invincible determination—an honest purpose once fixed—and the victory. That quality will do anything that can be done in the world; and no talent, no circumstances, no opportunity will make a two-legged creature a man without it."

Sir Edward Bulwer-Lytton said: "What men want is not talent, it is purpose; in other words, not the power to achieve, but the will to labor. I am no believer in genius, but I believe that labor, judiciously and continuously applied, becomes genius."

But Asa was warned that he must add to a strong heart a busy hand.



"A lady was choosing between two applicants for a position as gardener while her mother-in-law, seated on the porch behind the men, pointed frantically towards the less prepossessing. Supposing that the old lady had some personal knowledge of the applicant, she engaged him. 'Did he ever work for you?' she asked, when the two were alone. 'No,' replied the old lady, 'I never saw or heard of either of them.' 'Then why did you point to him? The other had the better face.' 'Face!' returned the old lady briskly, 'when you pick out a man for work, go by his overalls. If they are patched on the knee you want him. If they are patched on the seat, you don't.'"

In the field of mental life also it is hard work that wins.

"Perfectly Grand" Premiums

The premiums have all been received some days since. To say they are perfectly grand would be expressing my opinion of them very mildly. As always, they are far superior to what was promised. The calendar surpasses anything of the kind I have ever heretofore received. The photogravure of Dr. Klopsch is fine; I have it framed and hanging up in my room. It is an ornament worthy of a place in any home. The book, Life Work of Louis Klopsch, arrived in first-class condition, and I have read it almost through, as it was difficult to find a stopping place when once starting to read. It becomes more interesting as one page follows another. Long live THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and may its subscription list reach the million mark! J. P.

What the Scots Owe to Oatmeal

Archdeacon Sinclair—a Scotsman—in an address in London to working lads said: "I had four brothers, all six feet high. My father had fourteen brothers and sisters, ranging from six feet to six feet eight inches. And all were brought up on oatmeal."

In Scotland, oatmeal is the national dish. In China and Japan it is little consumed. These are the two extremes of the races as regards average height.

American Statistics

By a house-to-house canvass among the least informed, we find that not one home in twelve serves oats.

In the lowliest vocations, but a trifling percentage came from oatmeal homes.

A canvass of 61 poorhouses shows that but one in each 13 of the inmates had been oatmeal bred. And only two per cent. of the prisoners in four great penitentiaries had oatmeal as a childhood food.

But in sections where live the highly intelligent, seven out of eight are oatmeal homes. Four-fifths of all physicians—we wrote to 12,000—serve oatmeal on their tables. Out of 50 leading professors interviewed in one university, 48 regularly serve oatmeal.

Four in five of all college students came from oatmeal homes. So did two-thirds of the teachers of children. So did the great majority of the successful in every walk of life.

We also found that Boston consumes 22 times as much oatmeal per capita as do two certain states with low average education.

The Significance

The larger the percentage of the well-informed, the larger the use of oatmeal. That is everywhere apparent.

They who know food values know that oatmeal is the best-balanced food — the ideal food — especially for the years of growth.

It is richer than all other cereals in proteids, the body-builders, the energy-giving foods.

It is richer than all others in organic phosphorus and lecithin, the builders of brains and nerves.

For the years of growth, or the years of maturity, we have no other food which compares with oatmeal. We have none that is more delicious.

Quaker Oats

Made Only of Luscious Grains

These selected grains, rolled and prepared by our process, form the richest and best oat food in existence. Millions of people, scattered all the world over, have proved this fact by experience.

You get the oats that children love — the richest, best-flavored and most nutritious — when you get Quaker Oats.

GOT IT

Got Something Else, Too.

"I liked my coffee strong and I drank it strong," says a Pennsylvania woman, telling a good story, "and although I had headaches nearly every day I just would not believe there was any connection between the two. I had weak and heavy spells and palpitation of the heart, too, and although husband told me he thought it was coffee that made me so poorly, and did not drink it himself for he said it did not agree with him, yet I loved my coffee and thought I just couldn't do without it.

"One day a friend called at my home—that was a year ago. I spoke about how well she was looking and she said:

"'Yes, and I feel well, too. It's because I am drinking Postum in place of ordinary coffee.'

"I said, what is Postum?

"Then she told me how it was a food-drink and how much better she felt since using it in place of coffee or tea, so I sent to the store and bought a package and when it was made according to directions it was so good I have never bought a pound of coffee since. I began to improve immediately.

"I cannot begin to tell you how much better I feel since using Postum and leaving coffee alone. My health is better than it has been for years and I cannot say enough in praise of this delicious food drink."

Take away the destroyer and put a rebuilder to work and Nature will do the rest. That's what you do when Postum takes coffee's place in your diet. "There's a Reason."

Farmers and Automobiles

NEW YORK is just now the Mecca for automobilists. For three whole weeks during the present month the leading attractions of the metropolis will be a succession of automobile expositions, the first of these beginning December 31 and the last closing January 21. The first of these events is the exposition of the American Motor Car Manufacturers, held in the Grand Central Palace. Here is exhibited a variety of cars, ranging from the very cheapest to the highest priced; from the machine that can be bought piece-meal and assembled at home, to mammoth trucks.

A type of machine that has attracted much attention among a large class of people at the show, and especially among those who wish a car for business purposes as well as pleasure, is the convertible car with surrey body and detachable seats. When the rear seat is removed, the car is practically an open box wagon. They make excellent business wagons, and when the seats are in they are very neat pleasure cars. The Flanders, Ford, International Harvester, Hupmobile, Brush and several other cars can be had with either convertible or regular touring bodies. It is well worth the farmer's while to get acquainted with this particular type of car, as sooner or later he will be in the market for one if he has not already got one. There is also a great variety of moderate-priced touring cars and runabouts at figures calculated to suit the purse of the man of moderate means.

On January 7, the American Association of Licensed Automobile Manufacturers will open their show in Madison Square Garden. This exhibition, it is predicted, will eclipse anything of the kind ever held here or abroad, both in point of numbers and variety. Exhibitors to the number of 387 have space in the building. Some idea of the growth of the industry may be had from the fact that in the first exposition, in 1900, there were only 51 exhibitors. Cars in the greatest variety, from the costliest type down to the little $485 runabout, will be displayed.

During the third week of January, the second part of the Madison Square Garden Show will be devoted almost exclusively to commercial vehicles.

The automobile has been the means of developing many towns in the outlying districts, off the line of railroad travel. Even in some of the smallest towns, very good garages are now to be found. Farmers have come to realize that the motor is a real economy and time-saver, and instead of having to stint themselves to own them, they are really making money by them. Wisely they have waited until the motor passed the experimental stage, with its years of heavy outlay, before investing their money. Now, the manufacturers find that the great bulk of their moderate-priced product goes to merchants and farmers.

As an illustration in point, Mr. Fred A. Forsha, a farmer living about fourteen miles from Hutchinson, Kan., has introduced modern methods on his five-thousand-acre farm. His plowing is done by a gasoline tractor, which hauls an eight bottom plow. Formerly, twelve mules were required to haul a four-bottom. At daylight every morning, a little runabout takes the butter and cream into the town, making the fourteen-mile trip in half an hour. This same trip was formerly made by a strong double team and required two hours. By breakfast time the car is back again, ready for the farm work. The little car has also taken the place of four driving horses, which were necessary for getting over the farm. At the noon hour, the same car carries a good substantial lunch to the men in the fields. Mr. Forsha also keeps a touring car in which he takes his men to and from their work.

It is to the advantage of those who dwell in country districts that the modern automobile does not require an expert to look after it. The mechanism has been so simplified that any man or boy of average intelligence can care for his own car.

The variety of uses to which the automobile can be put is surprising. One man up in the New England States has been using his touring car for hauling heavy launches out of the water. Another utilizes his for driving a threshing machine. On the farm they have been made to perform almost every conceivable kind of task: Taking the milk to the creamery, hauling feed to the mill, doing the churning, cutting fodder, stretching wire fences, and many other things. In Oregon, the farmers in several counties are using heavy gasoline tractors of the "caterpillar" type in place of horses. These engines will plow ten furrows at a time and also draw the harrow and seeder across it.

Our farmers are not taking up the auto as a fad; they find that it is a profitable adjunct to their business equipment. They find that it increases their yearly income and lessens their labors. It has also made the life of the agriculturists much more attractive and agreeable by bringing them into close touch with the rest of the world from which they were isolated. It is estimated that nearly one-quarter of the total automobile output of this country is now owned by farmers. During the first six months of 1910, farmers in six of the Middle Western States bought over $20,000,000 worth of automobiles for cash. To some extent the automobile is solving the problem of how to keep the younger generation from leaving the farm.

Satisfying the Subscriber

HERE is one instance which shows how far an advertiser will go to please a customer. Some time ago we received a complaint from a subscriber in Canada, who stated that goods had not been received in return for money sent one of our advertisers. The advertiser on being questioned not only stated that he had sent the goods, but exhibited his express receipt. A tracer was sent, but the goods could not be found; so the advertiser sent a second lot. Again we received a complaint from the subscriber, stating that the second lot of goods had not been received. Again was an express receipt exhibited, and again the tracer failed to find the goods. A third time goods were shipped with the same result.

The advertiser claims that it must be due to the failure or refusal of the Canadian Government to receive the goods across the border line. However, rather than have the customer dissatisfied, and desiring to prove his good faith in the matter, he has just sent us his check for the amount originally sent to him by the subscriber, asking us to transmit the amount in our name.

We do not think that any advertiser could go very much farther than this in trying to satisfy a subscriber.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement.

Young People's Societies

Love One Another*

IT is a notorious fact that one never really knows the traits and disposition of another, until the two have lived together. As an old saying puts it, people must "summer and winter" together, before they know each other.

It would seem as though the members of a church might get on together far better than those of a family, who live in the same house from day to day, with the numberless opportunities for friction which that fact implies. But Paul's repeated pleas for peace indicate that there was a painful lack of harmony in the early churches.

This was to be expected in an age when ethical standards were shifting and uncertain; when rulers were seldom examples of virtue; and the gods generally worshiped were represented as indulging in the grossest sins.

We wonder that the early Christians, in view of these strictly historical facts, were as well behaved as the records show that they really were. But we wonder still more when we find churches and societies under the light of the twentieth century, divided into cliques and warring parties.

To do them justice, there are fewer of these than many suppose. Such as there are, are frequently due to the extra emphasis laid by the generation just past, upon orthodoxy of opinion, above charity and brotherhood.

The bitterness with which antinomianism was regarded by Calvinists; "Edwardeanism" by the "Bushnellites"; and the Quakers by the Puritans, is almost unintelligible to us of a more tolerant age.

But now we have to guard against the other extreme. Because we are willing that every man should have his own opinion, is no reason why we should fail to form strong and firm convictions of our own. Because this is an age when the cry everywhere is "peace and good will," is no reason why we should become, as Emerson expresses it, "a mush of concession," and act as though one belief were as good as another.

No; we must study God's word for right views on life, on our relationship with our Maker, with his church, and with each other. Having formed our opinions, though we must keep our minds open and must beware of obstinate prejudice, let us hold fast and prove those opinions, living them day by day.

One of our prominent senators is known as "the peace-maker." Whenever a quarrel threatens to divide his party, he is commissioned by one side or the other to try to compose it. His is a proud title. It implies untold beauty of character and high wisdom.

On the other hand, a certain excellent minister was known in his association as "the warrior." It seemed as though there were always "a chip on his shoulder." Like the Irishman in the story, whatever motion was before the house, it could be taken for granted that he was "agin it"—a most unfortunate disposition. A Christian born with it should fight it to the death.

The time is coming when wider schemes for church union than we now know, will press for attention and acceptance.

It is not without reason that the great Roman Catholic Church, unanimous, undivided, taunts Protestantism with its weakness, through its division into scores of warring sects. We want to be strong for the conquest of sin and the establishment everywhere of our Lord's high ideals of law and life and love.

"Be of one mind; live in peace; and the God of love and peace shall be with you."

Great Lives: Abraham*

IT is said that Abraham is the most famous human being that has ever lived. Millions of Mussulmans who have never heard of the great heroes of the Western world; who know nothing of the New Testament and little of most of the other heroes of the Old, not even of Moses, still know Abraham—the founder of the Jewish religion.

Isaac, Jacob, all who come after Abraham, speak of "the God of Abraham," or "the God of our fathers." Abraham himself never alludes to Jehovah thus. The religion of Israel dates from Abraham. There is no designation of God which can go further back to the origin of the Hebrew faith than "the God of Abraham."

In all of the wonderful story of this greatest of the patriarchs; a story in which a great faith, touching in its simplicity, shines forth in almost every scene; and in all the allusions to him in the New Testament; perhaps the most impressive and beautiful characterization of him is as "the Friend of God."

Abraham's intimacy with the Highest seems to have been recognized all through history. It set the great Hebrew apart, as one peculiarly favored of heaven. Other men worshiped afar off. Abraham was considered worthy of approaching the inner shrine.

The name which God gave to himself, in his conversations with Moses, was "I Am."

"It is a remarkable fact," said Dr. George P. Nichols, "that we do not know how to pronounce correctly the self-given name of God. We pronounce it as we find it written in the Hebrew Bible, Jehovah.

"But the Jews never wrote it correctly. They held it a capital crime for any person to do so. Only the High Priest, and he but once a year, might rightly pronounce the self-given name of God. For the rest, the scribes wrote it and the people pronounced it by taking the vowel sounds of another name of God, and uniting them with the radicals of this name. And so the true pronunciation is lost and can never be authoritatively fixed."

To this old patriarch, Abraham, God was a reality, "not an immense vagueness, a vast web of natural laws, a flow of blind, instinctive force," as in the minds of too many of us. To Abraham he was, says Dr. Nichols, "a Thinker, a Seer, a Hearer, a Lover, a Hater—a living Person."

But combined with this sense of his lovable personality, was, in the patriarch's mind, a full realization of his adorable power and majesty. And it was this lofty conception of an invisible God, coupled with the feeling that he was a Person, which singled out the Jewish nation from all others.

Truly, there was no god like unto their God, not only in reality, but in the thought of the people. Abraham's conception of God was the most intellectual and the most nearly in line with that of the New Testament, and of modern theologians, among those of all the nations of the ancient world.

Abraham was instinct with what Browning calls > the quality imperative in man—reverence . . .

> And by the light he saw, he walked. How else
> Was he to do his part? A man's with might
> And main, and not a faintest touch of fear,
> Sure he was in the hands of God.

Here was a great man with a great faith. That he was weak at times, but makes his strength more impressive; more than that, it brings him nearer to the level of mankind, and encourages us to feel that we may emulate his virtues.

687 Sold the First Day

Reserve Your Hudson Now

The first days' sales made to individuals by Hudson dealers—on the day when the new HUDSON "33" arrived—totaled 687 cars.

Three-quarters of a million dollars worth of automobiles sold the first day!

There has not been a day since, that orders for immediate delivery were not far in excess of our output. At this writing—in midwinter with a large section of the country covered with snow—we have unfilled orders for more cars wanted at once than we can produce in a month.

Judge what the demand will be in the spring.

You will see the necessity if you want this car, of arranging a delivery date now.

Dealers cannot be given more cars than have already been arranged for. We are, in fact, compelled to reduce some of the allotments made for early delivery.

Our whole output was taken by dealers before the first car was shipped. Some dealers had sold half the cars they had arranged for before they had received a demonstrator.

The over supply of low-priced cars last summer may have led some to think that good cars will be plentiful. But remember that the over supply was of old model cars, displaced largely by the announcement of Howard E. Coffin's latest design—the new HUDSON "33."

Howard E. Coffin is known for the successes he has produced wherever automobiles are used. The four famous cars he designed were the leaders of their time. At first he designed high-priced cars. Then he turned his attention to building a car that would give the same satisfactory service—that has the same grace and beauty and fine quality of materials, workmanship and finish that had been expected only of those selling at $2,000 and up.

The HUDSON "33" is his masterpiece.

Desirable cars are difficult to obtain when they are wanted.

You who wait until spring comes will surely find this condition. The most desirable cars will be sold far in advance.

The six leading makers, in all probability, will find it impossible to make prompt deliveries on all orders in May and June.

If you intend buying a car, begin your investigation at once and assure yourself of delivery when you want it. There will be no change in models or price.

Even cars that ordinarily have small demand, will be in large demand in spring.

By taking your car now you can get three months' extra use without extra cost.

A 1910 car driven 15,000 miles can be sold, if you desire, with less sacrifice than a 1909 model used only half as much.

Therefore, get your 1911 model early. It can be resold in the fall to as great an advantage as if it were delivered in May.

The Coincidence of the "33"

The remarkable thing about the HUDSON "33" is the way the latest models of the greatest European Cars resemble it. Leading engineers of Europe have just exhibited their newest designs at the Paris Automobile Show. Such famous makes as the Renault, Fiat, Mercedes, Isotta, Lancia, De Dietrich, Martini and many others, show identically the same ideas that Mr. Coffin, working independently of the European masters, put into the HUDSON "33".

Simplicity the Keynote

Simplicity is evident in every detail.

The number of parts used is 900 less than in the average car.

Oiling places can be reached without inconvenience or soiling the clothing.

Moving parts are all enclosed and dust-proof. This includes the valve mechanism, which is exposed in practically all American cars.

The frame is heavier than is used on any other car of its weight.

The motor and transmission are held together as a unit, giving all the advantages of both the three and four point system of suspension.

Wheels are stronger than are ordinarily used.

Springs are so designed that they are practically unbreakable, yet are easy and flexible.

There is greater leg room in the front seat than is provided in most cars.

The steering wheel is extra large—same as on the biggest, costliest cars.

Don't these facts make you want to see the HUDSON "33"?

Think what it means to obtain for $1250 the masterpiece of such an engineer as Howard E. Coffin.

Think what it means to obtain a car at that price that embodies the ideas that the leading European Engineers are this year putting on their cars, anyone of which sells for from three to five times the price of the HUDSON "33."

Then think what is indicated by the 687 orders taken the first day.

Doesn't that look as though it would be hard to get prompt delivery of a HUDSON "33" in the spring?

Therefore reserve your HUDSON now.

Write for complete detailed descriptions and address of your nearest dealer.

MILLIONS STARVING IN CHINA'S FAMINE

Missionaries and Officials Urgently Appeal for Help for the Sufferers in Three Provinces--Typhus Claims a Host of Victims--Appeal to American Generosity

FURTHER news has been received from China during the past week, confirming the earlier reports of the new outbreak of famine in the Grand Canal provinces. From our State Department in Washington, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is in receipt of another communication which puts beyond all doubt the fact of the famine situation. The letter is as follows:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON,
"December 24, 1910.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,
"Bible House, New York City.

"Referring to the Department's letter to you of the 21st instant, relative to the famine in the Province of Anhui in China, I beg to inform you that the Department has received a telegram from the Minister at Peking, in which he states that the reports of the missionaries and the press as to the seriousness of the famine have been confirmed by the delegates of the Province of Anhui to the Chinese Senate, and that from two to three million people are affected. The Minister adds that the situation will become more serious after the Chinese New Year; that the suggestion of American help has been gratefully received by the Anhui delegates, and that speedy action by the Red Cross Society is desirable.

"HUNTINGTON WILSON.
"Acting Secretary of State."

Besides the foregoing, missionary boards in the United States and Canada have received cable advices from the Missionary Interdenominational Committee in Shanghai which show that the famine is general over the northern part of Kiangsu and Anhui provinces. One despatch says:

"Three million people are affected. The Chinese government and people are generously contributing relief. According to report of missionaries in the districts affected, relief is insufficient. International Committee organized in Shanghai proposes that missionaries cooperate with generous Chinese to raise funds and in distribution. A million dollars is needed. Help must be carried on until May. Please communicate this to missionary societies. Church papers and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD urgently requesting contributions."

The State Department also has information from Peking that in one province along the Grand Canal, plague has broken out and that a very large proportion of the population is afflicted. This is no doubt the dreaded typhus or hunger-fever, which is the usual accompaniment of protracted famine conditions, and which finds in the debilitated victims an easy prey.

Just a little over four years ago, the black cloud of famine spread over this same part of Central China. Anhui and Kiangsu provinces were first swept by great floods and the whole of the vast plain west of the Grand Canal, embracing a section 200 miles long and 100 miles wide, was covered with water. All crops rotted and the floods did not abate for more than a month. In the present visitation it is not yet known whether this latest famine is the result of conditions similar to those that preceded the famine of 1906 or whether general crop failure has arisen from other causes. In any event it is made clear in the Missionary Committee's cablegram that conditions are serious and that the generous aid of the Christian world will be welcomed to help in the battle to save life and relieve suffering.

The two provinces together have a population of over 37,000,000 souls, of whom thus far 3,000,000 are affected by the famine. Past experience shows, however, that the number of the afflicted will very likely be doubled within a short time, as the meagre food supplies must soon be exhausted. Then, as was the case in the last great famine, the starving multitudes, abandoning their homes, will set out toward the large cities in the search for food. It was in such a pitiful pilgrimage in 1906 that large numbers lost their lives, perishing of exhaustion or famine fever by the way. All their grain was gone; their live stock had been sold or eaten, and they streamed across the country in long, straggling lines, in an almost aimless fashion. Nine cities were surrounded by some 800,000 of those refugees, who were compelled by the authorities to remain outside the walls in famine camps. Death reaped a daily harvest in every one of those nine camps. Then, as now, children were sold for the price of a little food or else abandoned by the roadside to perish of want.

Selling Flour at a Chinese Temple in Famine Time

A CHRISTIAN HERALD correspondent, William T. Ellis, was in China when the last great famine broke out. He was instructed to proceed to the famine districts and from the very heart of the suffering he sent such a truthful and vivid description of the scenes he witnessed that the sympathies of the American people were aroused. Through the efforts of this journal and its readers, two army transports, the Buford and Logan, were loaded with cargoes of foodstuffs and sailed from San Francisco for Shanghai. President Roosevelt, Hon. Elihu Root, Secretary of State, and Hon. Wm. H. Taft,

THE JUDGMENT OF THE BOOKS

TEXT: Rev. 20:12

IT IS a forecast of judgment, and a hint at the method of it. Books are opened; the record is consulted. Not "the" books—only "books"; it is not stated what books they are. But the dead are judged out of the things which are written in the books, according to their works. Shall we go far astray if we call these records the "Books of Conscience and Remembrance"? And then the ancient word is made luminous by our modern knowledge.

Triumphs of Modern Science

The science of our day has carried the processes of automatic registration to a marvelous degree of accuracy and completeness. The combined self-registering thermometer, barometer, and instrument for recording the humidity of the atmosphere is a well-known object of interest in health resorts and places where people have leisure for little beside the weather and its effect upon their physical well-being. Moment by moment through all the twenty-four hours the delicately adjusted mechanism responds to the incidence of heat or cold, to the pressure of the atmosphere, and to the damp or dryness of the air; and moment by moment through all the day the tiny fingers move and the minute ink-pencil draws its ascending and descending lines and curves, and prints its weather chart. In the earthquake zone the seismograph responds as readily to the oscillations and vibrations of the ground, and marks their range and volume unerringly upon the map. A thousand such instruments are devised by man's ingenious brain and are employed by him for his convenience, comfort, or culture, from the gasmeter or the taximeter, which nobody suspects of rigid adherence to scientific truthfulness, to the finest instruments of the observatory and the laboratory, where the supremely important matter is absolute fidelity to the facts of things.

We ourselves are such instruments of precision. We have, as a part of our physical equipment, and we are, in ourselves as spiritual beings, self-registering appliances which without volition, without consciousness, and with unerring accuracy observe, note, record and safely put away the record for eternal use as testimony for us and against.

Wonders of the Human Brain

The gray matter of the brain witnesses our good or ill. When once the man of science has made his instrument, and made it right, and adjusted it for its task, it begins its work. It will go on working without his aid and in spite of him. It may get out of order through interference from without. Or the man who has made it may destroy it. But while it remains in existence as it came from its maker's hands it will go on registering, and nothing but violence will stop it. The human brain, as it has come from its great Creator's hands, from the moment that life courses through its convolutions, and as long as it remains un-ravaged, un-destroyed, will go on recording. The blow of a club on the outermost covering of it or the thrust of a knife into one of its delicate hemispheres or a clot of blood within it may damage or destroy it; but while the brain remains a brain and the instrument of thought it will continue to take evidence, docket it, and put it away for reference with infallible orderliness and care. When Macbeth in his sore trouble of soul for his wife's distraught mind demanded whether the physician had any skill to "raze out the written troubles of the brain" the physician confessed his impotence. But when the doctor went on to add "therein the patient must minister to himself," he asked what, if the question should be interpreted in prosaic literalness, the modern physician knows can never be accomplished though Birnam Wood should move to Dunsinane!

Concerning Character

On the physical side of it we call this a re-arrangement of molecules. On its moral side it is—character. That word itself is remarkable—a history and a sermon are in it. For we use that self-same word to describe written or printed marks, as when we say, "printed in Roman characters, or in Old English, or what not," and to connote the constitution, disposition, or temperament of a living human being. This calls for explanation. What is the genius of our language that it names an ink-mark on a printed page and the sum-total of the attributes of man or God by the same word "character"? The explanation is striking. This is one of the words which we describe as red-veined with the life of the ages. The word is Greek. It is from the verb "charasso," meaning to engrave, to stamp as with a die, and it means the figure engraved or indented. Then in its moral, human sense character is that which is indented, engraved, stamped upon the soul of us, the distinctive and peculiar marks made upon the individual soul, a living, integral, indissoluble part of ourselves. Our thoughts, emotions, acts, have stamped this character upon our souls, even as at the same time they have automatically registered themselves in the structure of our brains. Did you say that our modern knowledge had dissipated into thin air the wild dreams of the recluse on Patmos? Did you hear it said that the Revelation is a nightmare which needs a revelation to explain it? And did you read that science could not find the soul and was disposed to expel God from his own universe? Not a word of it is true. Books are still kept, call them what you will. The record is preserved. Characters in the old Greek sense are engraved upon the brain; character in our modern meaning is engraved upon the soul. Living and dead we are judged by what is written in the books. And when the books are opened, we are judged out of that which is written in the books, according to our works.

The Dwarfing of the Soul

"According to their works," says the Scripture; and the literal-minded person who has been interested in the theological quibbles in which past generations delighted may think he would like to start and strike again the time-honored balance of faith and works. I advise you to do nothing of the kind. For our purpose, faith is work and work is faith. As the spirit that is in us so shall our actions be, and as our actions are so shall the soul become. The acorn falls from the oak and the oak springs from the acorn; as a man purposeth in his heart so is he; and as he speaks, does, and suffers so is his soul shaped. Here is a man of narrow faith and narrow spirit. His outlook upon life is narrow. His nature is parsimonious. Perhaps he never was built upon big lines, but there were the rudiments of things in him, and he might have grown. But he has become smaller and narrower. Generous impulses when they were felt were never allowed play. Emotions were starved. The high faculties of vision, the tender instincts of charity, were alike repressed until atrophy set in. So far from growing to his full height, he is a dwarf, a pigmy. And it is his soul that is dwarfed within him. His narrow faith is written in his brain, if you could see it; it is written in his soul and you can see it. For the strange paradox is true: the visible brain we cannot see and the invisible soul we do see! The record has been written automatically. The Almighty Artificer has made no mistake with his instruments of precision. More unerringly than the best thermometer or barometer or hydrometer, the soulometer has marked the course of his degeneration with invisible ink.

The Soul Seen in the Face

And here is a man of large and lofty spirit. Early he came under influences of love and gentleness, and early the mind that is within him made them its own. He thought and loved, he aspired and prayed, his soul grew large. The good and the beautiful made their appeal to him and he responded to their approach. He loved the song of birds and nature flowing free, and he loved his fellow-men. His faith in man and God was generous and broad; his hopes were high; and his strength was as the strength of ten because his heart was pure. And you can see it in his face. It is all there, all written in the books. It is written in the brain where you cannot see it; it is written in his soul, and the soul's records are secure. Did not Emerson once quaintly suggest that there is a relation between bulk and moral force and that we might settle the rights and wrongs of many a political question by weighing a hundred advocates of each of the contending parties? I suggest to you a more practical and convincing method of judging upon a large scale the effect of differing theories of life. Gather together into one view all the people you have ever known or seen or can think of who love the Church better than the saloon, and all the people you have ever known or seen or can think of who love the saloon better than the Church! If it could be done, no living human being upon this earth who is capable of connecting two ideas would ever need to read one single printed page of argument against either upon "the fruits of the liquor traffic" or "the evidences of Christianity." The question would be settled forever. Emphasis is a curious thing; and we mean something vastly different when we say a person is good-looking from what we intend when we say he is good-looking. It may be that there are some of us who try to be good who have to confess that we have narrowly escaped being homely—in the American sense of the word.

The Soul that Looks God-ward

If you could take a composite portrait of a magnified man or woman made from a million prophets, apostles, saints, and martyrs, and not excluding such inferior persons as preachers, trustees, deacons, and Sunday School teachers; and if you could put beside it a composite portrait of a magnified man made from a million specimens of the tyrants, bandits, loafers, and wastrels of our civilization, you would see that the good-looking is amazingly and gloriously the good-looking, too; and that the good-looking face is the expression of a good-looking soul, a soul that looks toward God. A woman is more disfigured by her rage at thirty than by her age at seventy; and when a man, in Dogberry's phrase, "writes himself down an ass," or writes himself down a cynic, a sensualist, a traitor, an exploiter of his fellow-men, a mean and narrow-minded thing, he has inscribed his record upon the fleshly tablets of the brain as well as in the inexpungeable records of the soul. We ourselves are compelled "even to the teeth and forehead of our faults to give in evidence"—the evidence of the Books, Conscience and Remembrance, gray matter of the brain and intangible, indestructible element of the soul, and we shall be judged "according to our works."

The Soul Its Own Recorder

Well, now, there is another fact to be noted in connection with this anatomical commentary upon the Revelation of John the Divine. Every thought, emotion, act, we have said, makes an impression upon this gray layer of brain. It may be so slight as to seem, for all practical purposes, non-existent. Yet there may be in it, unsuspected by us, sufficient intensity to make an impression which, though it remains, as it were, meaningless, insignificant and dormant for half a life-time, one day shall condition our life itself. Twenty years from now you may say or do things which you could not or would not say or do if it were not for the impressions made upon your brain by the thing you are saying or doing or suffering or hearing or seeing to-day. Multiply single impressions; deepen their intensity; structural and functional changes are effected in the brain; and the day will come when those changes will tremendously, it may be passionately, perhaps fatefully, determine your conduct, your character, and your destiny.

The text speaks of a judgment, and we have always thought of a judgment day. John in his pictorial way meant us to think of a judgment day. Now we are in the habit of saying that every day is a judgment day; and that is true. But some days are more of the nature of judgment days than others are. There is a seed-time and a harvest; there is a sowing and reaping; there is a summer and winter which fail not. There are days when we are setting more causes at work, and effects are produced. But the day comes when those effects become epoch-making causes and results follow of limitless and it may be of everlasting range. Five, ten, twenty, thirty years from now the effect of that which we are now doing or suffering may leap into activity as a potent cause. The past proves itself not past but a vital present, and the dead is not dead but most fierily alive. There are certain fluids with which you can write and the writing is invisible until heat is applied. You can write with pure milk on white paper and when the milk is dry the writing is invisible. Lemon juice acts in the same way. So do nitrate of cobalt and chlorate of cobalt. Write with them on ordinary white paper and nothing is seen. Bring them to the test of fire and all the writing comes out with startling vividness, in one case red, in the other blue. For these invisible writings the fire makes a judgment day. Shock or sorrow, bodily weakness and sickness, mental strain, emotional anguish, supply such test of fire to the invisible writing upon our souls. Or, to go back to our older comparison, under the influence of shock or strain or sorrow or fiery trial of any kind these impressions made upon the brain become potent and active. Now, for weal or woe, they make their power felt. It is what the New Testament calls a "crisis," what we have translated a "judgment." Now is the crisis of our days; now is the judgment of the books revealed. And now, when we have to call out the hidden reserves of life from their lurking places in the soul, the crisis is determined by that which is written in the books, according to our works.

Death is the commonest incident of life—except birth. Everybody is born. Everybody dies. And the mysterious thing is that we do not know either what life is or what death is. We have no idea what death is. And we can form no certain idea as to what it can do. We do not know whether death can destroy life, for we do not know what life is nor death. But it is obvious that death is an enormous change. It is demonstrable that it is the greatest strain and shock which the human system ever undergoes. The exit from this life is more of a strain and more of a shock than the entrance into it because we are bigger and more responsive entities when we go than when we come. And so it is easy to believe that if the shocks and strains and storms and emotions and crises of life call into the light of day the records that were hidden in darkness, the great elemental, world-shaking crisis which we call death may assure the unveiling of these secret things complete and startling beyond all parallels known in life. The thought of the twentieth century affords a hundred potent reasons for declaring that books will be opened, and that the living and the dead will be judged out of the things written in the Book of Conscience and Remembrance, according to their works.

So—it is good to sit alone with one's conscience. It is a salutary exercise. It brings solemnizing, chastening thoughts. But a more excellent way show I unto you. I pray you sit not alone. Call into conference with you and your conscience the Christ of God. He pledges the restoration of all things. In fellowship with him is to be found a cleansing baptism of love and hope. In the power of the new life which he confers, the new aspiration, the new outlook, the new purpose, in the power of the new spirit which he gives, new records are made, new characters are engraven on the soul. If any man be in Christ Jesus there is a new creation. Old things have passed away. Behold, all things are become new. We shall be judged—we are here and now being judged—out of that which is written in the books, according to our works. And we are happy in the record and joyous in the judgment. If any man be in Christ Jesus—whatever record leap to light, he never shall be shamed. And the first word of Omnipotence which in the Glory-land falls upon our waiting soul may well be that which greeted creation's primal day: And God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good.

"Things that Are Catching"

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

HAVE you boys and girls had the measles? I hope you have had not only measles, but whooping-cough, chicken-pox and a number of the other troubles that are catching. Why do children rather than grown-ups catch these diseases? Simply because they take the first chance and catch children before they are grown-up. If you have had these troublesome complaints then you are free from them for the rest of your life.

Have you ever thought of how many things are catching? Sin is catching. If you are with a child who had sin in his heart you may catch it from him. Bad manners are catching. Many children get bad habits just as they get measles and whooping-cough, by catching them. I knew a boy who caught the smoke-habit. No, he did not catch it from an auto. I heard of a girl who caught the habit of anger, and would "get right up in the air." No, she did not catch it from a bird-man. These habits are worse than the measles and whooping-cough. Why? Because if you have measles and whooping-cough in childhood, you will not find them catching in manhood and womanhood.

BUT there are other things that are catching, and it is about these that I want to talk to you. Good manners are catching, and kindness is catching, and the Christ-life is very catching. If you are with people who are good and who are leading the Christ-life you will find that something from these people gets into your heart and you begin to live as they live. If your chum gives his street car seat to an old lady or gentleman, you will be almost sure to catch the habit. If you go to church, Sunday School, and prayer meeting every week, your chum will be almost sure to catch the habit. If you become a Christian your friends will find it is catching. Then for once in your life you will have something of great value to give all your friends and enemies.

I ONCE read of a husband who, after living several years with his wife, became good-looking. His wife's face was catching. Smiles are catching. A boy caught a smile from his mother and it cured his anger. Kind words are catching. A girl heard her father speaking kind words about her teacher and the girl caught the habit. The people saw Stephen's face and noticed how bright it was. Boys and girls should study faces. You study arithmetic and grammar and spelling, and why not study faces? You would not be able to know arithmetic if you did not study it, and I am quite sure you cannot know faces unless you learn to study them. If you see a boy with measle-marks on his face, you keep away from him, because you say "Measles are catching." If you see a boy with a face like an angel, then you can go near him, knowing that his face is catching. In a Sunday School publication I found two good stories. The first story was this:

"My boy," said a wise father who knew how to play and be a "chum" with his twelve-year-old lad—"My boy, you do not own your own face." The boy looked puzzled. He had come to the breakfast table with a frowning, clouded countenance and had started moodily to eat his food. Everybody felt the shadow of his ill spirits evident in his looks. His father's unexpected words brought him back to life, and he looked up with a half-guilty expression, but did not understand what was meant. "You do not own your own face," his father repeated. "Do not forget that. It belongs to other people. They, not you, have to look at it. You have no right to compel them to look at a sour, gloomy, and crabbed face." The boy had never thought of them, but he understood, and he did not forget, and all of us should understand, and none of us should ever forget, that our faces belong to other people.

THE second story was: In the Union Station at Kansas City, after the night had settled down, a girl found herself in the crowd which almost always throngs that depot, and she knew no one in all that multitude. She was a servant girl, and she expected some one to meet her. But no one came, and she did not know how to go to the place. She was timid and frightened. For a long time she stood in distress. After a while, however, she saw a man standing near who attracted her interest. She studied his face very closely, seeking to determine whether she could trust him. At last she decided she could do so, and timidly addressed him and explained her condition, and asked him what she could do. He was at once interested, and, asking her to remain where she was, he set out to find a deaconess. Finding her, he explained the case, and took her to the girl and introduced her. Very quickly the deaconess made arrangements which relieved the girl from all anxiety, by which she would be cared for during the night and taken in the morning to the family she was to serve.

Returning to the gentleman to whom the stranger had appealed, she explained what had been done, and told him what the girl had said. "I looked and looked at the man's face until I was sure I could trust him. I think it was the best face I ever saw, and I knew he would help me." That man's face meant a great deal to that distressed girl, and all unconsciously, our faces may mean very much to many people.

The Gospel of the face is always being silently preached. Our faces, indeed, belong to other people, for other people see the qualities of spirit, good or evil, beautiful or ugly, which our faces reflect.

A Meteoric Financier's Fall

THE Northern Bank of New York, an institution having nine branches in the city, and with deposits aggregating over $8,000,000, was closed on Tuesday, December 27, by the joint action of the Banking and Insurance Department of the State of New York. It was announced, however, that no one would suffer loss. One of the directors stated that the bank had $4,000,000 in quick assets, which could be readily realized, and that these, with loans and discounts, would cover all deposits.

Irregularities led to the closing of the bank. The central figure in the operations, whose methods led to the investigation of the institution, is Joseph G. Robin, a man who has played a meteoric role in finance within the past few years. Only the day before the closing of the bank Robin was declared a paranoiac and committed to a sanitarium up the State. It soon became apparent, however, that the commitment was only a ruse to escape prosecution, and the sanitarium authorities declined to keep him. He was not twelve months in the country when he was a reporter for a leading daily. He had picked up a smattering of English, and he made it serve him as well as whole dictionaries and encyclopædias serve some other people. But his ambition soared higher than the drudgery of a newspaper office. He wanted money, and he resolved to get it. He gave up reporting and became a promoter of building and loan associations. Soon he got his foot on the first rung of the financial ladder, which he climbed nimbly to a height seldom reached by any born in his circumstances. It was then he changed his name from Robinovitch to Robin. Before he was ten years in the country, he was a banker and financier. Since then, or within the past six years, his career has been phenomenal. His enterprises have included some of the biggest deals in the financial history of the times and some of his schemes have been so colossal as to be almost beyond belief. A year ago he was said to be worth $3,000,000. He has lived in princely style and remained unmarried.

Robin operated on the "endless chain" method and reduced the "kiting" of checks to a very fine art. He was interested, officially and otherwise, in a large number of financial and business corporations and several banks. Sixteen years ago, he came to this country, a poor immigrant from Russia. He was then twenty-two years old and had but little education.

Counsel for the Northern Bank states that the depositors will probably be paid in full. Robin will probably have to stand trial for his irregularities, which have tied up $800,000 of the bank's money. It is not at all likely that any institution of consequence outside of the Northern will be affected by Robin's irregularities.

WORLD-PEACE WINNING ITS WAY

FOUR leading nations—Great Britain, Germany, France and the United States—are now actively represented in the movement for international arbitration. World-peace is no longer regarded as a mere visionary dream—something to be hoped for in the far distant future. It has received a great impulse within the last few months, and there are indications that the movement for the establishment of an international tribunal of arbitration, clothed with power by the voluntary act of the governments themselves, may not be much longer postponed.

Mr. Carnegie's recent gift of $11,500,000 for a World Peace Fund Foundation has focused attention both here and abroad upon the present condition of the movement and unquestionably it has brought many new and influential friends and supporters to the peace ranks. Peace demonstrations of an international character were held in London recently, and were very largely attended. One afternoon a reception was held in honor of the British and foreign delegates. It was set forth in the speeches that there is a strong undercurrent of sentiment in all civilized lands in favor of peace. The tremendously costly armaments, military and naval, and the intolerable burdens that now oppress the people of Europe as the result of maintaining the huge armies and fleets — which are constantly being increased—have reached a point where the load can be borne no longer.

While the European governments are hesitating about taking any decisive step toward peace, the attitude of the United States has given peace-lovers, here and abroad, the greatest encouragement. In his latest message, President Taft included an emphatic passage on the subject of world-peace. He said:

"Appreciating these enlightened tendencies of modern times, the Congress at its last session passed a law providing for the appointment of a commission of five members 'to be appointed by the President of the United States to consider the expediency of utilizing existing international agencies for the purpose of limiting the armaments of the nations of the world by international agreement, and of constituting the combined navies of the world an international force for the preservation of universal peace, and to consider and report upon any other means to diminish the expenditures of government for military purposes and to lessen the probabilities of war.' I have not as yet made appointments to this commission because I have invited and am awaiting the expressions of foreign governments as to their willingness to co-operate with us in the appointment of similar commissions or representatives who would meet with our commissioners and by joint action seek to make their work effective."

When the American Peace Commission is appointed and goes out on its high embassage, the eyes of the world will be turned toward it, and the prayers of peace-lovers everywhere will ascend that its work may be crowned with success.

Better Than Represented

PANDITA RAMABAI'S OWN STORY

RARELY has a more remarkable story of woman's life been written than that which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is privileged to give below. It is the story of Pandita Ramabai, founder of the great Gospel and industrial mission work at Poona, India, and it is from the Pandita's own pen. There is probably no woman in all the East whose career has excited more admiration throughout the civilized world.

Ramabai writes of her parentage:

"My father was a native of Mangalore district, but he chose a place in a dense forest on the top of a peak of the Western Ghats, on the borders of Mysore State, where he built a home for himself. This was done in order that he might be away from the hubbub of the world, and carry on his educational work, and engage in devotion to the gods in a quiet place, where he should not be constantly worried by curious visitors. He used to get his support from the rice-fields and cocoanut plantations which he owned. The place he selected for his home happened to be a sacred place of pilgrimage, where pilgrims came all round the year. He thought it was his duty to entertain them at his expense, as hospitality was a part of his religion. For thirteen years he stayed there, and did his work quietly, but lost all his property because of the great expense he incurred in performing what he thought was his duty. So he was obliged to leave his home, and lead a pilgrim's life. My mother told me that I was only about six months old when they left their home. She placed me in a big box made of cane, and a man carried it on his head from the mountain top to the valley. Thus began my pilgrim life when I was a little baby."

Her parents thereafter spent their lives in religious pilgrimages, obtaining subsistence by reading Puranas (the sacred books) in temples or elsewhere to the passers-by, who gave them presents of food and small coins. In her childhood almost she was made to study the sacred books of the Hindus and to know all the religious rites and ceremonies, the penances, the offerings to gods and goddesses, etc.

But as she grew to womanhood her religion "grew cold." She found no real satisfaction in it. She met many learned men; she read the Shastras and every religious book she could get hold of. But she was more and more dissatisfied. She found that the sacred books differed on many things. Yet all were agreed that women were bad, very bad, worse than demons, and with no chance of ever reaching the Hindu state of bliss.

"The husband is said to be the woman's god; there is no other god for her. This god may be the worst sinner and a great criminal; still he is her god, and she must worship him. She can have no hope of getting admission into Svarga, the abode of the gods, without his pleasure, and if she please him in all things she will have the privilege of going to Svarga as his slave. The woman is allowed to go into higher existence thus far, but to attain Moksha, or liberation, she must perform such great religious acts as will obtain for her the merit by which she will be reincarnated as a high caste man, in order to study the Vedas and the Vedanta, and thereby get the knowledge of the true Brahma and be amalgamated in it. The extraordinary religious acts which help a woman to get into the way of getting Moksha are—utter abandonment of her will to that of her husband." As for "the low-caste people, the poor things have no hope of any sort . . . except possibly by going through millions of incarnations."

In Assam, after her marriage, she one day picked up a Gospel of Luke in the Bengali language. She eagerly read it and burned to know more of the Christian religion. This she found opportunities to do both in India and in England, which she visited in 1883. In London she saw how Christian rescue work for women was conducted and she marveled, and asked herself: "Why should not the womanhood of India be helped and uplifted?" She writes:

"Thus my heart was drawn to the religion of Christ. I was intellectually convinced of its truth, and was baptized in the Church of England in the latter part of 1883. I was comparatively happy, and felt a great joy in finding a new religion, which was better than any other I had known before. I knew full well that it would displease my friends and my countrymen very much; but I have never regretted having taken the step. I was hungry for something better than what the Hindu Shastras gave. I found it in the Christians' Bible and was satisfied.

"After my baptism I studied the Christian religion more thoroughly. I was much confused by finding so many different teachings of different sects. For five years I studied these different doctrines, and made close observations during my stay in England and America. Besides meeting people of the most prominent sects, the High Church, Low Church, Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, Friends, Unitarian, Universalist, Roman Catholic, Jews and others, I met with Spiritualists, Theosophists, Mormons, Christian Scientists, and followers of what they call the occult religion.

"No one can have any idea of what my feelings were at finding such a Babel of religions in Christian countries, and at finding how very different the teaching of each sect was from that of the others. I recognized the Nastikas of India in the Theosophists, the polygamous Hindus in the Mormons, the worshipers of ghosts and demons in the Spiritualists, and the old Vedantists in the Christian Scientists. Their teachings were not new to me. I had known them in their old Eastern nature, as they are in India; and when I met them in America, I thought they had only changed their Indian dress and put on Western garb."

It is now nineteen years since the Pandita found Christ. She writes of her subsequent experiences:

"I had to give up all pride of our ancestral religion being old, etc., which is preventing many of my country people from finding Christ, although they know well that they have not got the joy of salvation. They can never have it except in Christ."

The Bible and the American College

Fraternity Bible Class, University of Texas

Bible and Mission Study Classes, Columbia University

By CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER

AT A LUNCHEON held recently in New York with sixty medical school students, the writer was asked especially to tell why medical men should study the Bible. I was able to secure some of my best reasons from the sixty students present, all of whom I found were studying the Bible in little groups meeting weekly and usually in the students' rooms. When I asked different ones the reasons for their study I received the following answers:

"Because a little Bible study each morning makes it easier to omit things that do not count."

"Because as a medical man I am interested in the great question of Life."

"Because I am ignorant of the facts of the Bible, and before having a right to talk about Christianity I feel that I must know scientifically what Christianity truly is."

Still another professional school student said he began to study the Bible because his roommate had overcome a certain bad habit of his life through the regular study of the Scriptures. "I realized," said he, "that this identical habit was greatly diminishing my power of will and would eventually have destroyed my usefulness. For two months now I have been studying the Bible for a half hour daily with my friend, and," he continued, "slowly I am gaining the victory."

These quite practical answers indicate some of the reasons for the great revival of Bible study among college men the world around, for it is a revival of unusual scope and power. Ten years ago there were not more than 6,000 students voluntarily studying the Bible in the colleges. Last year over 80,000 students in eighteen different nations engaged in systematic and intelligent study of the Christian Scriptures.

This movement, so vital to our modern civilization, is characterized by several distinctive features.

Scholarly Bible Study Courses

College students are now studying the Bible with methods and courses of study similar to those used in other departments of their education. Students in the past have often failed to achieve Bible interest because they have not been able to establish an intelligent and interesting point of contact with the Bible. With them as with others it has been more the need of knowing how to study. They have not realized how fascinating the Bible becomes to one who gives sufficient attention to it to realize the meaning of the Psalmist's words when he said: "Thy law is my delight."

The Bible has been adapted to college men in suggestive outlines by Biblical scholars who know both students and the Bible. These outlines cover such subjects as:

The Life and Teachings of Jesus Christ.
The Relation of Christian Teaching to Modern Social and Political Problems.
The Men of the Old Testament.
The Message of the Earlier Prophets to Modern Life.
The Bible in Relation to Choosing a Life Work.
Devotional Studies in the Psalms.
Paul's Message to the Church of Today.

I had the privilege of visiting Iowa State College at Ames, Iowa, a short time ago. There I found 800 students studying the life of Christ in voluntary Bible classes under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association. Three hundred of these men were members of Greek letter fraternities and were studying the Bible in small groups in their chapter houses. The leading students in athletics and undergraduate affairs were at the head of the movement. They were using a book by Dean Edward I. Bosworth, entitled, Studies in the Life of Christ. These studies cover thirty weeks and are arranged for daily use. Each student had a pocket edition of the Gospels. It was significant to me that at least one-third of the men in these classes were non-Christian men. In this sensible and practical way they were not only getting knowledge as to the life and teachings of Jesus, but they were applying this knowledge directly to student affairs. I found some classes considering such subjects as: The relation of New Testament teachings to honesty in the lecture room, profanity, deception, college athletics, and opportunities for college friendships.

A Bible Class Studying in Boats (Iowa University)

This Bible awakening has been characterized by broad and catholic spirit. The men who have prepared the courses and organized the student Bible campaigns have had in mind all the men in the institution and not simply a section of the student body. This fact is brought out in the reports of the past year's Bible work among students, which show that among 28,562 men actually attending Bible classes for two months or more in the North American institutions of higher learning, 6,156 men were non-Christians. I recently found a Bible class of Jewish young men studying at Columbia and another class of Oriental students studying at Cornell. In another institution I found a Bible class made up of eight separate nationalities.

This is demonstrated in the following table, representing institutions of the United States and Canada:

28,562 men were reported by 490 institutions as having attended Bible classes for two months or more.
9,089 men followed habits of daily Bible study in 338 institutions.
6,156 non-Christian men were reported in Bible classes in 302 institutions.
5,061 fraternity men were reported in 120 institutions.
2,308 students were used to lead Bible groups in 306 institutions.
2,272 of these leaders were in attendance at 305 normal classes in 139 institutions.
810 faculty men co-operated in the Bible study work in 295 institutions.
1,252 men were led into the Christian life through Bible classes in 101 institutions.
35,657 student Bible study text books were purchased.
185 Bible study reference libraries were available in 142 institutions.

That the busiest students in the colleges have time for Bible study is evidenced by the number of men holding prominent positions in college life who were in Bible classes last year. These included:

1,522 members of 'varsity football teams.
1,454 members of college glee clubs.
653 editors of college papers.
1,402 members of 'varsity baseball teams.
755 class presidents.
983 prize and scholarship men.
712 members of 'varsity basketball teams.
92 members of 'varsity crews.
1,053 members of 'varsity track teams.

Training Student Leaders

These Bible classes among students were led last year by 2,272 student teachers who were trained for their work by college professors, clergymen, and college alumni in 305 normal classes. Hundreds of these students received special training, moreover, in Bible institutes and summer student conferences. During the present year there is being held a series of Bible institutes covering the entire student constituency of the United States and Canada. While in the college as in the church one of the greatest needs consists in the ministry of trained teachers, nevertheless each year teaching is becoming more efficient among students.

In a series of Bible institutes which I had the privilege of attending in the Chinese Empire last year, over 3,000 students were enrolled in Bible classes; one-half of these were Confucianist students or members of religions other than the Christian religion. I found also that Hindu, Mohammedan and Parsi students knew the Bible, as a rule, better than they knew any one of their own sacred books.

The wisdom of this broadened Bible interest is becoming more and more apparent each year through results of the study. Over a thousand students are yearly reported as joining the church from the student Bible classes of the United States

Help China's Starving Ones

CHINA'S new visitation of famine appeals to American sympathy. We need not repeat here the story of privation, suffering and death from famine and fever, which are fully told in another part of this issue. Urged by the Missionary Committee in China and with the approval of the State Department in Washington, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has opened its columns to relief contributions. Send your gift as speedily as possible, that no time may be lost in turning it into food for the starving. Your contribution in all likelihood may be the means of saving at least one precious life! The Path Toward World-Peace

A CORRESPONDENT of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD writes asking how it is proposed that the World Peace Foundation Fund of $11,500,000 recently given by Mr. Carnegie shall be spent, so as to be of the greatest advantage to the cause of peace. It is probably somewhat too early to anticipate the plans of the trustees, who have not yet gotten their true bearings. There are many ways in which this fund can be made to do an immense amount of good in the direction of world peace. It has been suggested that it should be used for the establishment of a Court of Sociologists at The Hague; but that would simply be endowing another college, with possibly another library in addition. On the other hand, to utilize the bulk of Mr. Carnegie's princely gift exclusively for the support of a corps of teachers, writers and speakers, like some of those who now make the peace propaganda a paying profession, would be a policy of doubtful wisdom.

More could be done towards peace by the conservative journals of the civilized globe in a single year, than by all the millions of Carnegie and Rockefeller and other rich men combined. The press is the real educator of the age, the moulder of public opinion, and, to a large extent, the maker of history. Lord Northcliffe owns over thirty publications, including the London Times—"the Thunderer." He is a "jingo" and has been urging Great Britain to arm against the possibility of a Germanic invasion, although the people of Germany have no quarrel with England and are as peace-loving as any people in the world. Lord Northcliffe has the ear of five millions of British readers. If he were to wheel his publications to the side of peace, and strive to create public sentiment in that direction, he might become one of the greatest benefactors the world has ever known. In our land, we have several owners of publications who might easily put themselves in the position of doing similar good service.

The United States is already committed to the principle of international arbitration. President Taft, in his latest message, gave special emphasis to this fact. Our next step will be the appointment in Washington of a World Peace Commission, to go out as the ambassadors of this republic, inviting the nations to join us in seeking to abolish war.

Christian Science's New Peril

THERE are indications that a crisis is not far distant in the Christian Science organization. A few weeks ago, in commenting on the demise of Mrs. Eddy, this journal said that if the church she founded was of God, it would stand, and if not, that no power on earth could perpetuate it. Now there is war within the church which she founded. It is torn by dissensions, both of a spiritual and material character. As long as the founder was alive, the organization held together and with the exception of a few occasional dissentients, who were promptly disciplined, its progress was unmarked by internal troubles. Now that Mrs. Eddy has gone and the church is headless, a strange condition of affairs presents itself. One of the best known Scientists, Mrs. Augusta E. Stetson, who aspires to the supreme leadership, has come out boldly with a statement which savors strongly of blasphemy. Mrs. Stetson declares that "every true believer in Christian Science must know that Mrs. Eddy will make a manifestation—will reveal herself to me and to others, to the outside world, the unbelievers, too." She goes on to say that as Jesus rose from the grave, Mrs. Eddy will do likewise, "for she occupies in the world of to-day precisely the same position that Jesus occupied in his day." This belief in Mrs. Eddy's resurrection, she affirms to be the very essence of Christian Science, "to deny which would be to refute all her teachings." This extraordinary manifesto ends with the declaration that "the age of the Gospel is closed." That these are not the views of the Christian Science Church, nor the teachings of Mrs. Eddy, is made clear by a statement from the Publication Committee in Boston, which expressly denies that the founder herself ever made any claim such as that which Mrs. Stetson has advanced. "Mrs. Eddy," says the statement, "was inexpressibly shocked at the suggestion of any comparison between herself and Jesus Christ," and years ago published a denial of any such blasphemous nonsense. In that denial she wrote, "There is and ever can be but one God, one Jesus of Nazareth." While the organization cannot be held responsible for the vagaries of an irresponsible individual member, still it would be well, if it desires to be treated with any measure of respect and toleration, to give a clear and unequivocal repudiation to the new and startling Stetson doctrines, which head in the direction of the most dangerous form of fanaticism.

More "Frenzied Finance"

THE case of the Northern Bank, New York, which has become so heavily involved through the "frenzied finance" schemes of Robin, the controlling influence of that institution, should be a warning to other banks to adopt methods that should make it absolutely impossible for any one to exploit a bank's resources and bring disgrace upon its management. Fortunately, in the present instance, the depositors will lose nothing, nor will any other bank be affected. The directors will have to make good the shortage. By the irony of circumstances, on the very day that the Robin discovery was made the directors of the defunct National Bank of North America were compelled, under law, to pay over to stockholders $211,000, the shortage incurred by the speculations of Charles W. Morse, now serving a penitentiary sentence for financial juggling.

Robin's case, however, justifies no reflection on bank management generally. All experience and investigation show that our financial institutions as a whole, are conducted on sound, conservative principles. Bank directors realize the duty they owe not only to the stockholders and depositors, but the general public, and the responsibility which rests upon them in regard to the people's funds.

Dr. Klopsch's Monument

WHILE we believe that the suggestion of a Pittsburg subscriber—printed on another page—for a permanent memorial to the late Dr. Klopsch, is one calculated to find favor in many quarters, we have decided, after much consideration, to lay the whole matter before our readers for their ultimate judgment. For months past we have received similar letters—many hundreds of them—and lately in increasing numbers. Many of these have urged us to take immediate steps looking to the erection of a suitable memorial and a few have even sent contributions. We heartily appreciate these kind and loving suggestions. In our opinion one of the most practical is that proposed by our Pittsburg correspondent, who sums up the expressions of hundreds of other readers regarding a memorial to Dr. Klopsch.

Long before his death Dr. Klopsch chose his last resting-place. It is in Sleepy Hollow Cemetery, in Tarrytown, on the sloping eastern bank of the Hudson River, at a spot which overlooks Mont-Lawn, the Summer Home he founded for the tenement children. It was the best-loved of his many benevolences, for his whole heart went out to the little ones. It was he who named it "The Children's Paradise." During his last sickness, he told those who stood about him, "I want to sleep in sight of Mont-Lawn." This wish has been respected. Had he been consulted, he would never have consented that any marble memorial or stately shaft should perpetuate his memory, but he would have planned to endow Mont-Lawn, and make it a perpetual monument to his own efforts and those of the great army of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, for the benefit of the little children of the poor. This was the dream of his later years, and his dearest wish.

As our correspondent points out, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was the instrument through which, under God's guidance, Dr. Klopsch accomplished what he did. The great work he established can best be continued through the same channel. We believe THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is destined to grow and that its field of service will constantly widen. If our friends agree that Mont-Lawn should be Louis Klopsch's monument, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will gladly give its co-operation to a plan which seems the most suitable that could be devised.

The Bible Study Revival

WE TAKE pleasure in presenting in this issue the first of a series of notable articles by Clayton Sedgwick Cooper, on the great Bible revival that is now in progress. This initial contribution deals with the reawakening of interest in the old Book in our colleges and other institutions of learning. Mr. Cooper is authority on the subject, and has made a specialty of its accurate statistical presentation. His articles are full of cheer and Gospel encouragement. He shows that the day is forever past when the study of the Word of God was confined to theological seminaries, divinity schools and church Bible classes. Great Biblical scholars have arisen who have employed their consecrated talent to make the message of the Book so clear that all may understand. Think of 28,000 men studying in Bible classes in 490 different American institutions; of 8,000 men in one university, studying daily the life of Jesus; of 9,000 making it their daily guide; of over 1,200 conversions in one year in our colleges; of 6,000 non-Christians, including many Jews, studying God's Word on purely Christian lines; of large classes, composed exclusively of Orientals, poring over it systematically in American colleges. These things are happening here in our own land, to-day. And the tide of the Bible study revival is still rising. Mr. Cooper's able presentation of these facts constitutes a complete refutation of the claim from infidel sources that interest in the Bible is dying out. Where ten years ago 6,000 students in different colleges throughout the world were studying the Bible there are now 80,000 doing it systematically in eighteen different nations. These are sledgehammer blows against the enemies of the old Book.

Manufacturing Gods

ONE of the institutions of the world which has not felt the press of hard times from high price of living is an idol factory at Sagaing, Burma. Workmen chisel stone images of Buddha, the great Oriental religious teacher who lived about five hundred years before Christ. He was born a prince, with every luxury at his command, but, because he pitied the suffering and sorrow of the rest of the world, he gave up his wealth and position and devoted his life to trying to find out the path of happiness for other men. The central idea of his teachings is the duty of unselfishness, but it has come down to the present day all tangled up with curious Oriental philosophy and grotesque stories with which it is difficult for any Westerner to sympathize. Statues of Buddha almost always represent him seated, engaged in spiritual meditation. They are found in all Buddhist temples, and people say prayers before them. No well-educated Buddhist actually prays to the image. The statue is intended only as a reminder of the great teacher and his doctrines. But the great mass of Buddhists (there are 148,000,000 of them in the world) are ignorant and superstitious and many of them do actually "bow down to wood and stone." These idols hewn out of stone are the images of a man-made deity, who cannot rise any higher than the thoughts, aspirations, weaknesses and vices that the flesh is heir to. Many of these weaknesses and sins are reflected from the shrines of Buddhist temples throughout the world, and produce a wretched social condition. The uncreated God, through Christ the divine Son, has given to the world the only true religion, the only one which can effect the moral purification and spiritual salvation of the human soul. The Psalmist thus compares the imbecility of idolatry with the true religion when he says:

Their idols are silver and gold, the work of men's hands. They have mouths, but they speak not; eyes have they, but they see not; they have ears, but they hear not; noses have they, but they smell not; they have hands, but they handle not; feet have they, but they walk not; neither speak they through their throat. They that make them are like unto them; so is every one that trusteth in them. O Israel, trust thou in the Lord; he is their help and their shield. (Ps. 115: 4-9.)

Cities and the Census

The recent census reveals the fact that there are nineteen cities containing 250,000 or more inhabitants, and of these three take their place among the ten largest cities of the world. These in the order of their magnitude are, London, New York, Paris, Tokyo, Chicago, Berlin, Vienna, St. Petersburg, Philadelphia, and Moscow. Four American cities, Newark, Los Angeles, Minneapolis, and Jersey City, have entered the quarter of a million mark since 1900. The order of the first of the five largest cities of the United States has remained the same for a score of years. They are New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis and Boston. Baltimore and Cleveland, which were sixth and seventh in 1900, have changed places since then. The other twelve of the nineteen cities with 250,000 population or more are: Cleveland, Baltimore, Pittsburg, Detroit, Buffalo, San Francisco, Milwaukee, Cincinnati, Newark, New Orleans, Washington, Los Angeles, Minneapolis, and Jersey City. They range in population from 4,766,883 to 267,779. Los Angeles, which ten years ago had 102,479 population, has now 319,198, passing from the thirty-fourth to the seventeenth in the list of American cities. Twenty-two cities have doubled since the United States census ten years ago. Ten of them are in the West, eight in the South and four in the North. For rate of increase, two Oklahoma cities lead the country—Oklahoma City itself with 139 7-10 per cent. and Muskogee with 494 2-10 per cent. The next in the list is Birmingham, Ala., with 245 4-10 per cent. The other cities which have more than doubled in the last ten years are Pasadena, Oakland, San Diego, and Berkeley, Calif.; Flint, Mich.; Seattle, Spokane and Tacoma, Wash.; Fort Worth, Dallas and El Paso, Texas; Huntington, W. Va.; Tampa, Fla.; Schenectady, N. Y.; Portland, Ore.; Wichita, Kan.; Waterloo, Ia. The census shows that there are fifty cities of 100,000 or more and 228 cities with populations of at least 25,000. The census reveals the continued rush to the cities, with the perplexing problems and fearful responsibilities which that rush implies. It will tax our mental, moral and religious resources to keep pace with the marvelous progress of each decade and year. Taking the census is no new thing. It was customary in olden times. At the divine command Moses took a census early in the history of the Jewish nation:

And they assembled all the congregation together on the first day of the second month, and they declared their pedigrees after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, by their polls. (Num. 1:18.)

A New Mineral Discovered

The London Telegraph is informed by a correspondent in Madrid that a new mineral has been discovered at Benahadux near Almeria by Señor Calafat, who has named it Calafalina. It produces, after being calcinated, pure aluminum and pure sulphate of soda. It is thought that this new discovery will revolutionize the sulphate of soda trade, which has heretofore been monopolized by the Germans. It is stated that an American firm has offered to buy 60,000 tons of this calafalina each year, but the offer has not yet been accepted. Thus the investigation and invention of our time have achieved another reward which will contribute to the betterment of men and a higher standard of righteousness. The search and persistency employed in finding God's truth in his physical kingdom are required in the discovery of the saving truths in God's spiritual kingdom. It has been the asking, seeking and knocking in the material as well as spiritual realm that has led to discovery and satisfaction.

Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find: knock, and it shall be opened unto you. (Matt. 7:7.)

A Modest Heroine

In the midst of the jam of Christmas shopping in New York, Mrs. Margaret Gowrie was standing on the platform waiting for an uptown subway train. She held Elsie, her daughter, 22 months old, in her arms. A sudden gust of wind blew off the mother's hat, and she set the child down a moment to run after it. Meanwhile the little creature toddled to the edge of the platform and rolled off onto the track. The mother was so frozen with horror that she could not speak, but the crying of the child attracted the attention of another woman who stood near by, who slid down onto the track just as the uptown train rolled into the station. The woman threw the child up on the platform toward the mother, and not having time to climb up herself, she stepped backward over the wooden covering of the third rail and hugged one of the pillars between the tracks, and the train passed by without striking her. The ticket-chopper helped her to the platform, and said he would be compelled to make a report of the occurrence to the proper authorities, and requested her name as a necessary part of his report. She obstinately refused to give her name, stating that she did not care to be hailed as a heroine for simply keeping her wits about her and doing her duty as a woman. The nameless woman was a real heroine after all. It was woman's love, awakened at the cry of the child, that made her forget all danger and any thought of self. The world knows no higher standard of heroism after all than that of a sincere woman's love. In this woman's action there was added the element of modesty so likely to accompany the truest heroism. This modesty of love Christ taught in his Sermon on the Mount when he said:

Sleds Loaded With Gold

Half a ton of gold was brought over the trail on dog sleds by a party of five miners who arrived at Seward, Alaska, recently. This is the camp's largest clean-up since the close of navigation for the winter. The gold was sent to the Government assay office at Seattle, Wash. When Secretary Seward paid the few millions of dollars for Alaska, many thought he had made a bad bargain, having purchased nothing much but ice and snow. His statesmanship was far-seeing. Alaska is a fortune on the surface and a treasure of gold beneath it. From the earliest times gold has been rare enough to be precious and plentiful enough to be employed as a circulating medium and for decoration and other practical purposes. Hiram's servants and those of Solomon went in the navy after gold:

And they came to Ophir and fetched from thence gold four hundred and twenty talents and brought it to King Solomon. (I. Kings 9:28.)

Christ's Story Quelled Mutiny

Captain Wessel Stefens, of the Hansa Line steamer Crostafels, which arrived at Boston recently from Calcutta, says there would have been a mutiny among his crew of Lascars had it not been for a Christmas tree in his cabin trimmed with many colored electric bulbs. Before the Bay of Bengal had been crossed, the Lascars had become sullen, and kept from the decks only when they were forced to do so by the officers. They became convinced that an evil spirit was following their ship. When one of their number, Mohammed Ali, became ill and died within twenty-four hours, they openly threatened trouble. The night the seaman's body was buried in the deep, they screamed like maniacs for hours and had to be driven to the forecastle, and so on Christmas Day the captain called the Lascars aft, showed them the Christmas tree, and told them the story of Christ and his death. That night the sea became calm and the wind died. The Lascars again crowded aft, fell on their faces before the Christmas tree, and thanked God for having banished the evil spirit which they thought had been pursuing their vessel. The voice of Christ that stilled the tempest on the Sea of Galilee is the only one that can quell every fierce tumult of passion and hush into a calm the angry storm of human strife. The feelings of this mutinous crew were similar to those expressed by the companions of the Master when he stilled the sea:

And they feared exceedingly, and said one to another, What manner of man is this, that even the wind and the sea obey him? (Mark 4:41.)

Christmas at the Bowery Mission

By Rev. John G. Hallimond, Superintendent

IT WAS Sunday morning and Christmas Day. I had just come from the Tombs prison. For several years past it has been my mournful privilege to speak to the congregation in the Protestant chapel of that place on the last Sunday morning of the year. The service was over. I had tried to deliver a Christmas message of good will and hope. I had taken with me one of my own valued coworkers, Walter Mullen, who had himself, three years ago, been a prisoner in the Tombs, but whom God had wonderfully delivered from a debased and drunken life. His clear and honest testimony had produced a marked effect upon his hearers. There were only a small number who, when the closing invitation was given, did not raise their hands in token of their desire to live a better life.

As, however, we stepped from out the gloomy shadow of the prison gateway, and breathed deep full-lunged drafts of this Christmas Sabbath morning air and freedom, our hearts were heavy as we thought of those we had left behind. Many, perhaps most of them, were spending their first Christmas Day behind the bars. The indelible brand of crime had burnt its black stigma into their souls. "Peace and good will" seemed something of a mockery to them. The Christmas bells were jangling out of tune. We hurried on to a more joyous scene in our own beloved Mission on the Bowery.

Christmas Dinner to the Homeless and Unemployed at the Bowery Mission

As we reached the familiar thoroughfare the first sight that greeted us was a long line of men, something like our own midnight Bread Line, waiting for entrance to the rooms of a great East Side politician who was dispensing a Christmas dinner to thousands of his constituents. We said to each other, "This will surely lessen the number at our meeting," but when, at the appointed time, "Mother" Bird took her accustomed place as leader, the Bowery Mission Christmas crowd was as great, and probably happier and more enthusiastic than any of its predecessors. The platform was filled with as bright a lot of men as you could wish to see.

Down in the body of the hall sat one hundred or more of the Brotherhood, men just beginning to live the Christian life. Their faces shone with the radiant light of a divine joy, and when the first hymn, "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," was announced, they sprang to their feet and led the hundreds of their gloomier brethren behind them in this altogether apt and stirring Christmas anthem. Then followed other hymns, the "family prayer," as "Mother" Bird calls it, and the reading of the captivating chapter from Luke's Gospel, telling of the "Holy Night" and its wonderful happenings. Then came a sermon from my assistant, the Rev. W. T. Twamley, B.D., long known as a powerful preacher in the Protestant Episcopal Church. His text was, "The power of the Highest shall overshadow thee," and his discourse dealt with the birth of Christ in the human soul. How well those dear fellows in front knew the glorious truth of which the preacher spoke. When the sermon was finished one after another rose to his feet and in earnest ringing words testified to the incoming into his life of the "dayspring from on high."

The meeting in the evening was larger, if possible, than ever, and the Christmas spirit more intense. We had not been without anxiety concerning some of our new converts and the big dinner of the political boss in the next block, for an abundance of beer is always one of the prominent features of that annual spread. When I arrived at the evening meeting, however, the leader of the Brotherhood, Mr. Balevre, made his way to me and with glistening eyes told me that with two exceptions the flock was safe.

The preacher was Dr. Wilbert D. Ferguson, one of the leading educators of the country, and for many years an earnest preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church. His plea was so stirring and powerful that at the close some forty men publicly gave themselves to God. Again were the testimonies from the men clear, ringing and strong. The soloist for the day was Mrs. Hallimond, who sang in the morning, "In the Fields With Their Flocks Abiding," and in the evening, "'Tis the Birthday of Our Saviour."

Then came the Bread Line, and in the early hours of Monday morning the distribution of dinner baskets to poor families. This is such familiar work that the mechanical routine is easily managed, and this year under the able guidance of our devoted business manager, Mr. Hunt, it went off in a smoother fashion than ever. But, oh, the tragedy and pathos behind it all! The dire, distressing poverty in these days of plenty. The thin wan faces of the children; the pinched care-furrowed cheeks of the widow, and the forsaken wife! The big bundle of applications for dinners that we could not entertain! Only one hundred baskets could be provided—a poor pitiful provision to meet the dreadful demands of hungry people in this winter time—but the glad delight of those who were fortunate enough to obtain a coveted basket was heart-touching indeed. CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, let me say "Thank you!" on behalf of these poor recipients of your bounty. I wish you had been there to see how really grateful they were.

At our annual Christmas meeting on Monday evening, twelve hundred dinners were dispensed and a happy, jovial time was spent, with many conversions at the close. The principal speaker was our chairman of trustees, the Rev. Dr. Charles H. Mead. He spoke of the blessedness of getting wandering prodigals back to the father's house, and related a touching case in his own experience, when he was the instrument in effecting such a reunion.

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—NEW YORK is to have the largest hotel in the world. It will be erected at Thirty-third Street and Broadway, and will be known as the Greeley Square Hotel. The hotel investment, including site, hotel building and furnishings, will represent an outlay of $13,500,000. The site, which covers 31,500 square feet, cost $7,600,000. The building will be twenty-five stories high, and will have 1,600 sleeping rooms and 1,000 baths.

—THE MILK DEALERS' ASSOCIATION of New York have instituted a campaign to bring about an even standard and quality in all "loose milk" supplied to the people. A laboratory has been equipped and experienced chemists and bacteriologists engaged to make analyses and tests on the supply of any dealer that may come under suspicion. A competent corps of inspectors will keep constant watch for any infringements of sanitary rules.

—ON MONDAY, DECEMBER 26, at Los Angeles, Calif., Archibald HOXSEY, the aeronaut, broke all records for ascension by reaching a height of 11,474 feet in a Wright biplane. This is 975 feet higher than LEGAGNEUX, the Frenchman, reached at Pau on December 9. Mr. HOXSEY was two hours in the air, and during that time covered a wide expanse of territory ranging from the mountains on the north and east to the sea on the west.

—ONE OF THE signs by which we may measure the dimensions of the Liberal victory in the British elections is the amazing proposition by Mr. Balfour that hereafter all questions involving a deadlock should be decided by a referendum to the voters of the country. In advancing this proposition the Lords virtually acknowledge themselves subordinate to the popular will. Now, it is contended that the referendum would act as a clog to parliamentary progress, as it would open the way to the submission to popular decision of many questions which have a direct interest for only a comparative handful of voters.

—A GRAND RAPIDS, Mich., police judge has initiated a novel plan in dealing with those brought before him charged with intoxication, and it promises to work well. He sentences the erring ones to attend the local Rescue Mission every night, for terms ranging from thirty to sixty days. The religious influence of the mission is beginning to be felt on confirmed tipplers. They have ceased to appear in the police court. The officers of the mission are provided with commitment papers, the same as a jailer, and all who are sentenced to attend the services are warned that if they do not put in an appearance at the mission every night, they will be taken to jail. Needless to say, all prefer the alternative of attending the mission.

—MARIA RAFFA and Stanislao Pattenza, the instruments of the "Black Hand" gang in the kidnapping of the two children, Giuseppe Longo and Michael Rizzo, in Brooklyn on November 19, were sentenced by Judge Fawcett of that borough on December 27 to not less than twenty-five years' imprisonment. The man will serve his time in Sing Sing, the woman in Auburn. It was one of the quickest trials on record. In sentencing the prisoners, the judge made a scathing arraignment of the "Black Hand."

—THE Oriental Economic Review makes a thoughtful suggestion in connection with the use of the Carnegie Peace Foundation Fund. It says, "We believe a portion of the new fund should be used in threshing out, once for all, the real genesis of the intermittent recurrence of this deplorable war scare bogie. We believe that an international body of eminent scholars and distinguished statesmen should make an exhaustive study of all possible causes of conflict between the United States and Japan on one side, and between England and Germany on the other. This investigation would, in all probability, bring a clear solution of such vexing problems as the readjustment of the balance of power between what we may call a settled nation and one newly arrived in the list of Great Powers, would arrange matters attending immigration from the densely populated countries to regions awaiting development, would fix the position of certain races in the society of nations, and would discover the means for the restoration of such rights and possessions as may have been lost through national weakness, with no necessity for the inhuman test of war."

—MRS. HARRIET IRWIN, a leader of the Gospel Settlement, 211 Clinton Street, New York City, writes to this journal: "As I have received letters from several of the families who received their Thanksgiving dinner from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I thought your readers should not only have the thanks expressed, but they should know that their kindness and bounty, which finds its way into so many homes to cheer and benefit, is greatly appreciated. One writes: 'My Thanksgiving text, II. Cor. 9: 11. Being enriched in everything to all bountifulness which causeth through us thanksgiving to God.' Another letter says: 'Dear Friends: I am more than thankful to our heavenly Father, the Giver of all good gifts, for my Thanksgiving dinner; in fact, the supply did me for a whole week. May God bless and reward our benefactors!' Another writes: 'Please thank THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers for the Thanksgiving basket, which I and my family enjoyed very much. It has been very hard for me; for four weeks my husband has not been working. As each woman passed out of the Mission, there was a gentleman stood there and asked God to bless each one that passed out. I appreciated that, for I had been sick. With thanks to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. A mother.' Still another writes: 'Please thank THE CHRISTIAN HERALD folks for being so kind to a poor widow. I enjoyed the basket very much. The things were lovely. I appreciated it more than ever, for I was sick.'"

ECONOMY OF THE AUTOMOBILE

A FARMER near Ellinwood, Kan., who owns over thirty-five hundred acres of land in different parts of two counties, has lately become an enthusiastic automobilist. Formerly, he required four driving horses at an upkeep of thirty-five dollars a month, to take him around his place, that he might oversee the work, and during the threshing season, he had to leave his house as early as four o'clock in the morning, and often did not get home until after ten o'clock at night. Some little time ago, he bought a second-hand touring car. Now, even in the busiest season, he does not have to leave the house before seven in the morning. He has more time with the men and even gets leisure to stop at the post office for his mail before going home to dinner. He sometimes uses the car for hauling a wagon or trailer loaded with grain, hay or wood, the machine giving far better service, he says, and costing less than horses.

Has Mount Sinai Been Identified?

THERE has always been much controversy about the identification of the real Mount Sinai on which Moses received the Commandments. Recently contentions as to the mount and its location have become more emphasized, many distinguished authorities marshaling themselves on rival sides.

Sir Richard Burton, the well-known scholar and traveler in his time, held that it was futile to try to discover the exact spot of Sinai and pronounced all attempts at identification as necessarily vain. Many have been inclined to agree with Burton, but now comes the announcement that the precise whereabouts of the famous mount has been determined, seemingly beyond doubt, by an Austrian explorer named Dr. Alois Musil, who, carrying a commission from the Turkish government, left Vienna in April last year for Northern Arabia. Whether Biblical scholars and cartographers will confirm Dr. Musil's claim or dispute it remains to be seen.

Some learned authorities, among them Scriptural savants, archæologists and scientists of world-wide fame, say, with Burton, that it is impossible to exactly locate Sinai, inasmuch as the names Sinai and Horeb were interchangeable and were used indiscriminately as in the case of many other places in the early Biblical time. That Sinai is in the southern part of the peninsula lying between the Gulfs of Suez and Akabah there can be no question, though the late Dr. Beke of England claimed it was not in the peninsula at all, but east of the Gulf of Akabah, and in order to substantiate his theory he also claimed that Mizraim or the Egypt of the Bible occupied the whole of the peninsula. The origin of the name is not known. It may be Semitic, denoting "cleft with ravines," or it may be Egyptian, signifying the "place of Sin"; that is, the place devoted to Sin, the moon-god. In Exodus 19: 1, 2 we read that in the third month of their journey, the Israelites "departed from Rephidim, came into the wilderness of Sinai . . . and camped before the mount." It seems that the base of the mount in front of the camp was so sharply defined that barriers had to be put up to keep the people from approaching rashly and touching the sides. While Moses was receiving the law on the summit "the thunderings and lightnings and the voice of the trumpet" were so near the camp that the people in terror "removed and stood afar off," yet still remained in sight of the mount.

What particular mountain was this where the Lord spake with Moses "face to face as a man speaketh unto his friend" and where he revealed himself in such glory and majesty as were not witnessed on earth before or since that time?

Despite contention from able sources Sinai and Horeb are not interchangeable terms, so the one must not be confounded with the other.

It has been shown so emphatically as to be accepted as proof positive that the name Horeb was that given to the ridge and that Sinai was a peak in the ridge which Moses ascended to receive the Commandments. The section through which the Israelites had to pass after leaving Rephidim is called "the wilderness of Sinai" and naturally took its name from the mountain peak. Nowhere do we find mention of the wilderness of Horeb. That some translators have identified the Mount of God with Horeb is not at all confirmatory of its being a peak, much less of its being the peak upon which the Lord came down in thunders and lightning. He came Horeb-ward; that is, to the range called Horeb. "I will stand before thee upon the rock in Horeb." Note the preposition. This certainly must be taken to mean some particular rock in the range called Horeb. Moreover Horeb never has the prefix "mount" except in Ex. 33: 6, whereas Sinai always has it except in two passages, one in Exodus and one in Deuteronomy, with their two dependent passages in Judges and the Psalms. Josephus, the Jewish historian, mentions only Sinai.

If, then, Horeb was the range and Sinai the peak, just what particular peak was it? As there are three claimants to the name, it is necessary to investigate the credentials adduced by the advocates of each. Before, however, going into details, it is necessary to consider what must have been the indispensable features and surroundings of the true Mount Sinai. First, it must have been a summit overlooking the place where the people stood. In the next place the space in front of it must have been large enough to accommodate the great number of Israelites who followed Moses out of the land of Egypt. Lastly the space where the people stood must have borne such a relation to the base of the mount that they were enabled to approach, but could not touch.

In a consideration of the Sinaitic claims the first peak to engage attention is Jebel Serbal. This is the most conspicuous mount in the range, though not the highest. It rises to a height of 6,342 feet above sea level. But the natural conditions surrounding the peak eliminate it from the list as the mount on which God appeared to Moses. It could not possibly have been the Sinai of the Law. The Wady Feiran is three miles distant and from there only occasional glimpses can be had of the summit. Therefore this place could not have been the encampment of the Israelites. We are told the people still remained in sight of the mount, for "the sight of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire on the top of the mount" (Ex. 24: 17).

Mount Sufsafeh, the Probable "Mount of the Law"

The peak of Jebel Musa is the next which demands attention. Several modern authorities are in favor of its claim. It is about 7,000 feet high and lies thirty miles east of Jebel Serbal. On the southeast end it is bounded by a rugged wady called Sebalijeh, which would not have afforded a resting place for the vast Israelitish hosts.

The third claimant is called Ras Sasafeh, or Sufsafeh, and is a peak jutting up from the northwestern point of the ridge from which Jebel Musa springs. It overlooks the plain Er Rahah, and has all the characteristics which proclaim it the real spot on which Moses received the law. The plain Er Rahah is more than two miles in length and from one-third to two-thirds of a mile in breadth, and the eye can follow its course as it skirts the mountains in the distance. It seems, if not an ideal, at least the most likely place in all that country where a large number of persons could have suitably made an encampment. The summit of Ras Sufsafeh is visible from every point of this valley. The topographical conditions are in perfect keeping with the Biblical chronicle. A low line of alluvial mounds at the base of the mount answer to the bounds which were to keep the people off from touching the sacred sides of Sinai under penalty of incurring immediate death. In fact, the cliff in which the mount of Sufsafeh terminates, rises up like a huge altar which that great congregation of the Israelites might have easily beheld, limned in bold outline against the darkling purple of that Eastern sky.

Secretary of War and President of the American Red Cross, gave cordial assistance in this generous movement and in official correspondence commended the work highly. It is estimated that thousands of lives were saved by prompt action in sending those two food cargoes at the most critical time. The food was distributed with great judgment under the personal supervision of the Missionary Relief Committee which had been organized at the request of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to conduct the work. That committee, with few changes in the personnel, is still in existence and for the last four years has directed THE CHRISTIAN HERALD famine orphan work in the Canal provinces, in addition to its regular missionary labors.

This new famine, while it is probably less formidable than that of 1906, has called the Interdenominational Committee again into active relief operations. This splendid body of experienced missionaries will again assume responsibility for a very large portion of the relief operations in the Canal provinces, and all contributions for China Famine Relief sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be promptly forwarded to the committee.

The famine is not confined to the two provinces of Anhui and Kiangsu. In a letter from Rev. T. J. Preston, of Changteh, in Hunan (to whom THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent a relief remittance recently) a distressing condition of affairs in that province is revealed. Mr. Preston writes:

"Your enclosure of draft for $113.32 has been received, and on behalf of the famine sufferers, I desire to thank you and through you THE CHRISTIAN HERALD contributors to this fund. We will need a great deal in January and February, as the cold weather will then be upon the people, and if you felt inclined to make a further appeal I am sure great good could be done. On a recent trip to the worst parts of the famine district, I found the people eating dried leaves, grass and rice hulls. The mortality is enormous! At the approach of winter, the suffering is of increased intensity. The famine is not in Changteh where we live, but in a district called Wei-Ti, about twenty miles distant, where, owing to the breaking of the dikes, the land has been flooded two years."

A first remittance of $1,000 has been cabled by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to our Interdenominational Missionary Committee at Chinkiang, Kiangsu Province, being advanced by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in anticipation of contributions. It is hoped that our readers will make liberal response to the urgent appeal of China, as the need will be desperate for the next two months or ten weeks.

Questions and Answers

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

Mrs. L. F. S., Alburg, Vt. 1. Who was Jephthah's wife, and what was his daughter's name? 2. What do the words "Shibboleth" and "Sibboleth" mean?

1. Jephthah was one of the Israelitish judges before the days of the Kings. His wife's name is nowhere given, nor that of his daughter. 2. The two words are identical and signify "an ear of corn."

S. O. H., Halifax, N. S. 1. What nationality is Frederick Cook, explorer? 2. Are the words "suffragists" and "suffragettes" used interchangeably?

1. Frederick A. Cook is of German parentage. His father, Theodore Koch, was a German physician, who came to this country in 1853; he changed his name to Cook in 1860. 2. A "suffragist" may be either a man or woman, who advocates suffrage by decorous methods of education, agitation, legislation; a "suffragette" is one of the violent sisterhood.

D. B., Toledo. What are the legends in regard to the "Wandering Jew"?

One tradition makes the Wandering Jew, Cartaphilus, door-keeper of the palace, who struck Jesus as he was dragged out, saying: "Go on, Jesus; go on faster," and to whom Jesus retorted, "I am going, but thou shalt remain waiting until I return." Cartaphilus was then thirty years old, and every time he reaches the age of one hundred years he falls into a swoon from which he awakes again a young man of thirty. The Western legend has it that when Jesus was on his way to Calvary, bearing the cross, he wished to rest on a stone before the house of a Jew named Ahasuerus, who drove him away with curses. Jesus said to Ahasuerus: "Thou shalt wander on earth till I come." The story says Ahasuerus has wandered ever since all over the world, seeking death, but not finding it.

T. J. S., Tonkawa, Okla. Where in the Bible can I find a denial of Christ's teaching in Matt. 6: 6?

There is no denial in the question. In this portion of the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus was warning his hearers against ostentation in religious duties, and showing them that where they did these duties to make a vain show in public, they offended the Father, who looked to the heart more than to the act itself. In verses 5, 6, 7 and 8, it is not the simple publicity of prayer that is condemned, but the spirit of religious pomp and vainglory, which he contrasts with the retiring character of true prayer.

J. K., Pickens, W. Va. 1. Who was the first missionary to America? 2. What is the dimension of a whale's throat? Is it large enough to receive a man? 3. Have Bible students rejected the story of Jonah and the whale?

1. The first missionary sent out was John Eliot, of London, who was followed by Mayhew and Brainerds. 2. The mouth of the Greenland whale is sixteen feet long, six to eight feet wide and ten to twelve feet high inside—large enough to receive the biggest man. 3. The Bible is fully accepted by all true Christians despite the scoffs and sneers of materialists and unbelievers. Some of the stories, however, are allegorical and must not be literally interpreted.

R. H. C., Mount Forest, Ont., Can. Please explain Num. 31: 18.

The war against Midian was designed to be one of extermination. The Midianites had equaled the worst of the idolatrous nations in the enormity of their wickedness. With the exception of the girl children, all were to be slaughtered for the reasons stated. With regard to your second question, the Latter Day Saints do not hold the same doctrines with the Mormons.

C. H. W., Lake Mahopac, N. Y. For what purpose was Peter's vision in Acts 10?

The vision was sent to teach Peter, and through him his associates, that the Gentiles were no longer to be regarded as unclean; that God was no respecter of persons; that ceremonial distinctions separating Jew from Gentile, and which had theretofore barred access to God, were henceforth abolished, and that all were equally admissible, Jew and Gentile, to his love and favor, and to religious fellowship and intercourse. It was literally to show that Jesus, through his Gospel, had broken down the "middle wall of partition" between Jew and Gentile.

W. J., Wilton, Ia. When it is midnight in the Pribilof Islands, what time is it in Eastern Greenland and Newfoundland? When it is noon at Pernambuco, what time is it at Guayaquil, in Gulf of St. Lawrence, in Galveston Bay, on Vancouver Island?

When it is midnight in the Pribilof Islands it is between 9 and 10 o'clock on the east coast of Greenland and between 7 and 8 o'clock in Newfoundland the following morning. When it is noon at Pernambuco, it is 9 o'clock at Guayaquil, 10 o'clock in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, 8 o'clock in the Bay of Galveston, and 6 o'clock in Vancouver Island on the same morning.

E. E. M., Ventura, Calif. Was Cornelius a convert when he met Peter?

He is supposed to have been what was known as a "proselyte of the gate"; that is, a Gentile who, having renounced idols and begun to worship the true God, frequented the synagogue, but not having come under the distinctive rite, was not reckoned among the Jews. He was "a man fearing God," and was chosen as the "first fruit of the Gentiles." Theophylact wrote that "though neither a Jew nor a Christian, Cornelius lived the life of a Christian." This was his condition when he met Peter. His actual conversion is recorded in Acts 10.

J. W. R., Hampton, Va. Why is Christ spoken of as of the seed or house of David? He could not have been so except through his mother, who with her cousin, Elizabeth, was of the seed of Aaron.

The Davidic descent of Jesus was practically undisputed in his own day. Paul appealed to this fact with confidence (see Heb. 7: 14; II. Tim. 2: 8). In the genealogies in Matthew and Luke, Mary, as well as Joseph, is represented as descended from David, and the Saviour's pedigree is traceable through both genealogies. Joseph's lineage was made out from authentic records for the purpose of the civil census ordered by Augustus; hence, it is a moral certainty that the genealogy of Jesus was extracted from the public registers, and that in transferring them to the pages of the Gospels the evangelists added such qualifying expressions as they deemed necessary for explanatory purposes.

Mrs. J. B. J., South Delabole, Pa. 1. Are there any descendants of Rechab living today, and keeping the vow made to Jonadab? 2. What is the meaning of the circle of light we see painted around the heads of some pictures?

1. The house of Rechab is identified with a section of the Kenites, who came into Canaan with the Israelites. It might be possible to trace through Hebrew genealogies the descendants of Rechab to the present day. Write to Editor, Hebrew Standard, New York. See reference in Neh. 3: 14, also Jer. 35: 3-10. A fraternal order came into existence in England in 1842, calling themselves Rechabites, and aiming at total abstinence. This order is still in existence. 2. It is called a halo, and is the artistic way of indicating sanctity or holiness. The artists, in the early days of Christianity, used it frequently in their paintings.

Miss C. H. R., Ashcol, Pa. 1. Who was Melchizedek? 2. What was done with John the Baptist's head?

1. Melchizedek was the priest-king of Salem, a man of great sanctity and a type of Christ. His identity is surrounded by mystery and has given rise to innumerable discussions. He was superior to Abraham, as Christ's priesthood was superior to the Aaronic priesthood. The statement that he had neither father nor mother (Heb. 7: 3), is simply held to mean that he had no recorded parentage of distinction. Josephus, the Jewish historian, says that his name signified "the righteous king." 2. Scripture tells us that the body of the Baptist was laid in the tomb by his disciples, and the presumption is that the head was recovered and lovingly placed with the body.

To Honor Dr. Klopsch's Memory

A Correspondent Suggests that the "Children's Paradise" be Endowed as a Perpetual Monument to its Founder

To the Editor of The Christian Herald:

I HAVE just finished reading that wonderful book, the Life-Work of Louis Klopsch. As I lay it down, I cannot refrain from an expression of thankfulness that it was my good fortune and great privilege to have a share, however small, in the charities of this remarkable man, whose career may well stand as a model for others to emulate.

As I look back upon his grand life, now closed, the moral stature of the man looms large in the vast enterprises he carried out all over the world, for the winning of souls and the alleviation of human suffering. All classes and conditions of men were his brethren. Indeed no one can read Mr. Pepper's grand book without being convinced that here was a true hero of the Gospel of humanity—a man who was and is an honor to the nation, and whose deeds will shine with greater lustre as the years roll on, while his name will be associated with those of the greatest benefactors of the race.

There is one passage in the Life-Work to which I yield special approval, and I believe there are thousands of others who will join with me. It is the author's suggestion that Dr. Klopsch's favorite charity, Mont-Lawn, to which he personally gave the endearing title of "The Children's Paradise," should be made his monument. He would have desired no other or worthier one. Had he lived, he would undoubtedly have endowed it and placed it beyond the need of public appeal. I would supplement Mr. Pepper's suggestion by adding that this is a task in which many thousands of your readers would joyfully assist. They loved Dr. Klopsch as I did, and they felt the same spiritual delight in his genial comradeship in the Lord's work.

Through his genius, he built up THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to be the greatest of religious journals, with a far-reaching constituency, and with it as his lever, he moved the sympathies of the world. He made his paper the channel for great benevolences. Without it, he could have accomplished but little. Why not utilize it now in a way that will augment its influence and raise a suitable Endowment Fund for the Children's Paradise? This is what Dr. Klopsch himself would have done, had he lived.

Let me suggest, then, that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD open its columns for the purpose of receiving the loving tributes of its readers toward a Memorial Fund to the man who wrote over the gates of Mont-Lawn, "I love God and little children," and who opened wide those gates to forty thousand little ones! THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, if it chose to cast the weight of its influence in favor of such a movement, could make it a triumphant success from the beginning. If you could set apart a portion of your resources for a limited period to this work, the endowment would be assured. J. S. H.

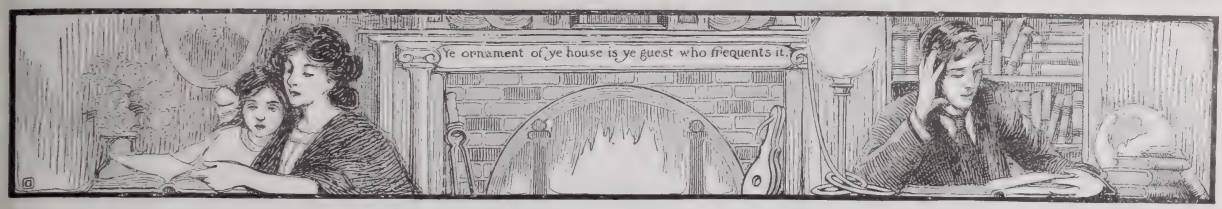
Miscellaneous

I. S. A., Rose Hill, Va. Any assertion of the kind cannot be maintained by reliable statistics.

Subscriber, Lucerne, Md. Paradise was a term employed by the Jews to express the state of future bliss, both in its higher and lower stages. The promise signified that they were never more to be parted.



Miss C. S., Nolensville, Tenn. Christ himself said that he came to fulfil the law, not to do away with it (See Matt. 5: 17). He gave it, however, in many respects, a new spiritual interpretation, illustrating by saying: "Moses said this but I say unto you." He gave us direct access to the Father and brought in the dispensation of grace through his Gospel, he himself being the final sacrifice to the law for the sins of the world.

Inquirer, Warroad, Minn. 1. The Christian view is that only works of necessity or of mercy are permissible on the Sabbath. One's own conscience must make this decision. 2. Paul had a "thorn in the flesh," which may have been some weakness or besetting sin. Many good people have some particular weakness which Paul (in Heb. 12: 1) describes as "the sin that doth so easily beset us." There is none perfect. Our part is to make a brave fight against temptation and to ask divine strength to help us overcome it.

T. H. J., Whitehouse, Fla. 1. The Bible gives no clue to the length of time consumed in Creation—that is, from our modern standard. A thousand years in God's sight are as a day. Man was the last of the creation and the crown of the work. 2. You should vote as conscience dictates. Prohibition will prohibit, some day, in good earnest. 3. We are not to judge others. God alone is judge. 4. With him all things are possible. Christ called Judas the "Son of Perdition," and we have no warrant to go beyond this. 5. Published in Washington, D. C.

J. H. S., Slatington, Pa. Commentators have simply dealt with the possibilities of John's baptism by some of his own disciples, but there are no actual facts on the subject. As he preached baptism, he himself may have set the example, although being of priestly descent through both parents (as you state) he needed no such rite to introduce him into the privileges of either the church or the priestly office. But John's Gospel was not in line with the teachings of the priests, consequently the likelihood of his baptism is all the stronger. However, this is one of those points concerning which there can be nothing but conjecture.

Are You an Egotist?

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

IN REPLY to the question, are you an egotist, almost every one will say no, without the least hesitation. Nobody likes to acknowledge that she is an egotist, the term carrying somehow a hint of self-complacency and self-absorption which is not quite agreeable. The egotist, we say to ourselves, is a vain, conceited and very likely officious person who is much more ready to talk about her own concerns than to be interested in those of her friends. One would be as reluctant to acknowledge one's self egotistical as to admit that one was a bore. It cannot be denied that many bores are egotists. On the other hand, every egotist is by no means a bore.

The defect in most women, younger or older, so far as social intercourse and conversation are involved, is that they bring everything to the personal equation. In discussing an opinion, an incident, a current event, they look at it from the individual point of view. Sometimes this is very amusing. If the subject uppermost at the moment is, for example, equal suffrage, and the arguments for and against this movement are being gravely advanced, a girl will shake her pretty head and declare with emphasis that she, for one, does not wish to be mixed up in politics. She has no desire to cast a vote, although she admires this or the other candidate, because he is such a gentleman and has such delightful manners. On election day, the girl proceeds, it would be unpleasant to get into a crowd and wait for one's turn, and any way she does not think it womanly to take part in public affairs. She would hate to serve on a jury and she certainly would never run for Congress.

Nearly all the great authors of the world have taken advantage of this eternally feminine quality in describing their masterpieces. Thackeray, Dickens, Trollope, Blackmore and Black a generation ago, and De Morgan, Arnold Bennett and James Lane Allen to-day in their different manners and methods take positive delight in painting the feminine egotist. Sometimes she is sweet, sometimes spicy, usually inconsequent and constantly inconsistent, but she steps to the front of the stage with an air of being in the right place. George Meredith was more chivalrous in his treatment of the gentle sex than most of his contemporaries, and Marion Crawford more frequently saw the egotist in man than in woman, but women themselves, when writing about women, have not scrupled to display their egotism with a firm and unerring touch. Any novel of George Eliot's may be read in proof of this, and among present day story writers one needs to go no farther than to Mary Wilkins Freeman and Margaret Deland.

To bring the matter to a practical issue, how are you and I to save ourselves from an egotism which will prevent our comprehension of other people's rights and our dealing justly with other people's wrongs? Ought we not to be on guard against believing all we hear, and misconstruing what we think we see among our neighbors and friends? Should we not give an accused person the benefit of the doubt when perhaps unkind gossip is busy with the person's name? In a story which I read the other day a young girl, who was employed in a certain family, was accused by her employer of the theft of a brooch. Vainly the girl asserted her entire innocence. She was indeed essentially fine, honest and honorable. She could no more have stolen a bit of jewelry than she could have dropped poison into the tea of the woman who took for granted that she had been tempted and had yielded to the temptation. The older woman was rich, well educated and a social leader. The girl was poor, solitary and illiterate, and circumstances were against her. "I know," said the lady with serene conviction, "that Nance took my brooch."

"Where is your proof?" was the natural question.

"Proof?" she cries scornfully. "I don't need proof, I tell you. I know."

So it came to pass that Nance, the child of poverty and misfortune, was turned away from one door to another, reproach following her, a net of lies tangling about her feet, until she was almost forced by virtuous women into a life of vice. In the end her innocence was established. I am afraid that something like this may happen oftener than we dream in real life. The woman who is an egotist is so strongly entrenched in her own position that she is color-blind to everything that she does not see with her own eyes.

"I dismissed a maid last week for intoxication," said a good, kind-hearted and compassionate woman one day in a talk with me. "She had been in my service six years, and I had never known her to drink, but she waited on the table when I had guests, and positively her behavior was disgraceful. She could not hand the dishes without danger of an accident, and her breath showed plainly to every one that she had been drinking. It was brandy or whisky or something of the sort, and I was humiliated and ashamed to have any one in her condition waiting on friends in my dining room. I paid her off the next morning, gave her the balance of the month's wages and told her she must go. I cannot tolerate intemperance in a servant. Oh, yes, she said she had been ill, but had that been so, why did she not go to bed? As an example to the rest of my servants I sent her away, and I am sure I did right."

Here again the action was due to well meaning but extremely cruel egotism. Six years of life under the same roof in the capacity of employer and employed ought to have deepened confidence and friendly relations between the two. The egotism of the mistress made her unfair in her judgment of the maid. No doubt it occasionally happens that the egotism of the maid prevents her understanding the shortcomings of the mistress. In human intercourse there must be mutual concession, and the egotist is not given to conceding an iota.

WINTER SPORTS

Old winter is genial and jolly,
His bluster is bracing and keen,
The wild winds may blow, bringing tempest and snow,
But moods of the Spring come between,
When the children can play in the merriest way,
And the ice gleams in silvery sheen.

Household Pets A little girl said the other day that she could never think of having as a pet a bird in a cage. It seemed to her that a bird ought to have its freedom and fly fearlessly about in the great world outdoors. Of course, everybody cannot do what Olive Thorn Miller did years ago in Brooklyn. Mrs. Miller had a number of birds in large and roomy cages. She personally attended to their comfort, giving them the food they preferred and neglecting nothing that could make them happy. The cages were kept in a large airy room, and their doors being open by day, the little feathered occupants went in and out at will, flew here and there as they liked and rested on posts, perches or the tops of pictures, just as they chose. Generations of birds have lived in cages, and if the pet bird is neither a starling, a wren nor a grackle, but a beautiful yellow canary, it will take kindly enough to the cage. The cheery song of a bird in the house adds much to the pleasure of life, and the child who has a bird for a pet receives a daily training in looking out for the welfare of a little creature that is entirely dependent. If boys are permitted to have rabbits as pets the care of these gentle animals must be left to them, and they should not be relieved of it by their parents. The trouble often is with household pets that they nominally belong to the children and actually are a burden to the father and mother. A cat, dog or pony which is owned by a boy or girl should increase in the youthful owner a sense of responsibility. A pony is not precisely a household pet. It is next door to one, and must be guarded as tenderly as any other animal belonging to the home.

An Ambitious Girl "What books would you recommend for the reading of a girl in the high school, one who wants to make the most of her opportunities? B. R."

In poetry read Tennyson's Idyls of the King, in history, Greene's Short History of the English People, and Justin McCarthy's History of Our Own Times. In biography, The Life and Letters of Louisa M. Alcott, The Life of Alice Freeman Palmer and the Autobiography of Mrs. Oliphant. In fiction, the earlier works of Winston Churchill and at least three novels of Charles Dickens, preferably Little Dorrit, Old Curiosity Shop and A Tale of Two Cities.

By the time a girl has read these books she will be quite ready to make her own selection along the same lines.

Synopsis of Previous Chapters

Little Jimmy Preston, aged six, gets a letter at the post office for his sister Barbara. On the way home it is lost. Barbara Preston has been trying to keep the farm, the last of her father's estate, for Jimmy, but it is mortgaged to Honorable Stephen Jarvis, who is comparatively young. He threatens to foreclose. Peg Morrison, the old farm hand, is as greatly concerned over the loss of the letter as is Barbara. She goes to Mr. Jarvis to ask for more time on the mortgage. He tells her that he is disposed to do it, and also that he is tired of his present housekeeper and would like her to fill the place. She leaves without a word. The old housekeeper at once becomes her enemy. Stephen Jarvis comes to see Barbara. He asks her to marry him and he will give her the place. She refuses. She thinks of her old lover who went away and whose fate she did not know. Jarvis drives up and insists she ride with him. He rebukes her for not asking his aid to obtain a school position he heard that she had applied for, and she tells him that she asked his aid once and was refused. He says that he had offered her another place. He renews his proposals and says her brother could live with them. He tells her that he has never loved any one else in his life. He leaves her at her own gate, where little Jimmy meets her and says Peg has found the letter. All she can make out is the post-mark. The handwriting is that of David Whitcomb, her old lover, whom she thought dead. Barbara writes to the address, Tombstone, Ariz. Jarvis meets her once more and walks with her, as she will not enter the carriage; and he tells her that he cannot give her up. He grasps her arm, but with the declaration that she is "free," she wrenches away. She makes a desperate resolution. Going to Mr. Bellows, the auctioneer, she tells him that she wishes to sell her skill and intelligence "to the highest bidder." She says a mortage on the place covers everything, and that she must sell her work for a term of years for $1,200. Against his will, he consents to auction her off. Jarvis is astonished when he finds Barbara is to sell her services. A small crowd gathers at the Preston farm on the day appointed, Mr. Bellows wishes to know if Barbara wants to "back out." She refuses to change her mind. Jarvis comes to protest. Whitcomb returns while the auction is in progress. $1,400 is bid. A man giving the name of Smith secures her services for $4,000. Whitcomb in anger demands who the bidder is, but cannot find out. Bellows says Barbara is to stay at the farm until called for but will not tell the name of the buyer for whom Smith acted. She hires Martha Cottle to come and keep house while she is away. She pays Jarvis his money. Whitcomb comes to see her. She finds him changed. He urges her to marry him, but she tells him she must keep to the contract. Martha Cottle asks her if that is the man who has purchased her. Barbara wonders if the woman has been eavesdropping. Months pass, still Barbara is kept in suspense. Whitcomb again urges her to marry him; she tells him they must await result of contract. Martha Cottle tells Peg Morrison Barbara is engaged to Whitcomb. Peg asks her how she knows and she tells him she has "overheard 'em spooning." Whitcomb dines at the Barford Eagle Hotel, where he is served by a waitress named Jennie. He vainly tries to bribe the auctioneer to tell him who has bought Barbara's services. He visits the Preston farm and dines with Barbara. Later, he meets Jarvis, whom he asks for further information, saying it is "an outrage to hold a woman bound in this sneaking, secret fashion."

XVI—Continued

JARVIS appeared to ponder this statement in silence for a while.

"Perhaps you're right," he said, at last.

"There's no 'perhaps' about it," said David excitedly. "Of course I'm right! Here I've been hanging about for months, waiting for the person—whoever it is—to show up. I'm ready to settle the business by paying back the money."

He met the other's sharply inquiring look with a boastful grimace.

"I can do it; don't make any mistake on that score!"

"And after you've made the transfer; what then?"

Jarvis' tone was icy; his eyes searched the handsome, flushed face at his side mercilessly.

David met his gaze readily enough.

"Why," he blustered, "you may as well know; I intend to marry Barbara. I'd do it anyway, contract or no contract, and we'd let that dog in the manger gnaw his bone till he's tired of it; only Barbara—Miss Preston—objects. She's like all women—sticks at a trifle, and yet is ready to swallow the earth, if you give 'em a chance."

"Miss Preston doubtless supposes that her honor is involved. I can conceive that she might do so. A—trifle I believe you called it. And if you——"

"Oh, come; what's the use of talking like that?" David interrupted impatiently. "I'm sick of all that sort of nonsense." He pulled his hat over his eyes and stared morosely at the landscape. "If I didn't care as much about the girl as I do, I'd cut the whole thing and go West again. This is no place for a man like me."

"I'm disposed to agree with you," observed Jarvis calmly. "Shall I set you down here?"

David recognized his surroundings with a start. They had reached the outskirts of the village, and Jarvis had stopped his horse in front of his own house.

"Oh, I may as well get out here, I suppose," he said sullenly.

He turned and lifted his hat to Jarvis with a sweeping bow.

"Much obliged for the delightful ride," he said, with a sneering upward quirk of the mouth.

"'Are you finding the delay very hard to bear?' he asked"

Jarvis sat motionless in his carriage watching the easy swing of the arrogantly youthful figure, as it passed down the street. He saw David go in at the front entrance of the Barford Eagle, yet still he sat silent, his brows drawn over brooding eyes.

His man, lounging in front of the stables, caught sight of the waiting equipage, and hurried down the driveway.

"Any orders, sir?" he asked. "Shall I take the horse, sir?"

Jarvis glanced at the man, something of his old irritability flaring up in his look.

"No," he said shortly, "I'm not coming in now."

He spoke sharply to his horse, turned abruptly and drove rapidly away, past the pollarded willows, over the echoing bridge and on into the country road beyond, muffled with the accumulated dust of a rainless midsummer. Presently, he reached and passed the stone gateway of the Preston farm, and its orchards laden with unripe fruit. He looked at both with the sombre, unseeing intentness of a man who is at war with his deeper instincts.

He had been prepared, he supposed, to judge Whitcomb fairly; but his late brief interview with his successful rival had left him bitterly antagonistic to the younger man. David's very physical beauty infuriated him. He recalled the level glances of his blue eyes, the curve of his lips, the carriage of his handsome head upon his broad shoulders with a sense of blind barbaric anger. But none the less, he fought with and subdued himself.

"I am unjust," he told himself flatly. For the first time in all the years of his life he had become dimly aware of the beauty of self-sacrifice, and of its relations to a pure and true affection. Even while the primal man within foamed under his iron grip, he compelled himself to think tenderly of Barbara, of her loveless youth, of her loneliness, of her heroism. Then he remembered with shame his own persecutions of her woman's weakness; for so it had come to look to him now. He recalled his brutal insistency, his threats, his unrelenting hardness, sparing himself in nothing, compelling his memory to flash before him every picture which contained them both.

He had traveled many miles before he roused to a realization of the lateness of the hour. The long summer twilight had fallen, like a roseate veil, over the rich landscape; the shadows had disappeared with the sun, and the great disk of a silver moon swam in the rosy light reflected from the sunset, which by now burned in crimson and amber splendors behind the misty purple of the hills.

His horse appeared jaded and weary, and Jarvis recalled vaguely that he had been driving at his old furious rate of speed. He leaned back against the cushions with a sigh, conscious of his own exceeding weariness, and allowed the mare to take her own gait. Out of the seething alembic of his thoughts had crystallized a single definite resolution. He would sift David as wheat in the close-meshed sieve of his own love for Barbara. He would scrutinize his past, he would examine his present; he would hold him under the lens of purity, of probity, of honor. If Whitcomb stood the test, Jarvis swore by all that he held holy that he would stand back and allow him to marry the woman both loved. If not—his strong fingers unconsciously tightened on the reins, and the obedient mare quickened her pace.

There was a light twinkling among the dark trees when at last Jarvis again passed the big apple-farm. He got down from his buggy, fastened the horse to a tree, and walked quietly toward the house. The long French windows stood open to the breeze, and within the lamp-lighted room Jarvis caught sight of Barbara. She was sitting close to the table reading aloud; at her side, leaning his yellow head against her knee, sat Jimmy, serious and intent.

Jarvis stepped boldly to the piazza, and tapped on the open sash.

"I guess it's David!" he heard the child say joyously. And saw the quick blush that rose to Barbara's cheek.

The blood sprang to his own temples and hammered furiously there for an instant as he looked at her in her diaphanous white dress. Then he stepped in at her quiet bidding.

"I was passing, and it occurred to me to stop, and—see you," he said awkwardly.

Jimmy had retreated behind his sister's chair, and was gazing at him with frowning intentness. Manifestly the child was disappointed.

"You were reading," he said, his eyes lingering on the hands which held the thin blue volume. "Won't you——" he hesitated; then went on boldly. "Don't stop because I am here."

She would have turned over the leaves and read other pretty trifles if it had been David instead of himself, he thought bitterly. He waited for a cold refusal.

"You wouldn't like A Child's Garden of Verses," Jimmy said unexpectedly. He had not removed his inquiring brown eyes from Jarvis' face. Something that he saw there emboldened him. "It's for little boys, littler than I am; but I like it."

Jarvis smiled, the singular smile new to his lips and of which he was not at all aware, any more than of the elemental changes in himself.

"Perhaps I'd like it, too," he said. "Nobody ever reads out loud to me."

"Read the one about the wind, Barb'ra," urged Jimmy; "the wind and the kites. I like that."

Barbara turned over the pages slowly.

"Shall I?" she asked Jarvis.

Her eyes lingered irresolutely on his

Something I Have Made—Contest

A Lots-of-Fun Merry-Go-Round

Invented and illustrated by John B. McDonald, age 13

A Bobmobile
Made by Oscar Nordberg, from two tadpoles, a pine board and an old steering wheel.

OUT of strong writing-paper, make one ¾-inch tube, 9¾ inches long, and two ¼-inch tubes 8 inches long. In one end of the large tube cut a slot into which to fit one of the small tubes; place the second small tube at right angles on top of the first, and hold it in place with a hat-pin. (Figure 1 shows arrangement of the tubes.) Out of the same stiff paper cut four 6-inch squares, with a slit in each square for the ends of the tubes to come through, and arrange as shown in Figure 2. Fasten this paper contrivance to hot sealing wax, melted and poured into the centre of a dinner plate on which you have already fastened four candle ends at equal distance one from the other. Now float plate and all on a rather deep basin of water, filled to the brim, light the candles, and away will go the Merry-Go-Round, round and round as merry as you please.

This invention won a Brownie kodak.

The Merry-Go-Round

An Easy-to-Make Wireless

By Herbert C. Lockwood, age 13

WE fellows wanted a wireless, so we learned the code and then sent to New York for one pound of No. 14 bare aluminum wire for the aerial, one telephone receiver, ten cents' worth of silicon, eight porcelain wiring cleats, and five cents' worth of tinfoil. In each corner of a ½-inch block of wood, 3 x 4½ inches, we bored a hole. In these holes we screwed the binding-posts. Out of an old copper kettle we cut an oval ⅞ of an inch wide and 1½ inches long, and a right angle oblong ½ x 3½ inches. In the longer piece of copper we bored three holes, one in each end and one in the middle. In the smaller piece we bored a small hole in one end, and then put the detector together. In the centre of the oblong copper we fastened a large-headed screw to adjust the detector. On one end of the small copper we fitted a screw filed to a point, to press against the silicon which lies beneath it on the oval copper, the other end I fastened to the base (see diagram). Our condenser was a box 4 x 7 inches and one inch high. We put the sheets of tinfoil inside the box, and put the lid with two binding-posts on. The aerial was made of four parallel wires 50 feet long fastened side by side by insulators to a stick. We hung it 40 feet in the air, and every now and again we pick up messages with it.

This invention won an A No. 1 watch.

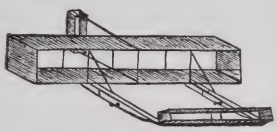
A Parachute Carnival

By Clarence Wood, age 11



NOTE: Some of the best work done by our boys and girls in the "Something I Have Made Myself" contest, was along the line of aeroplanes. Many of the ideas set forth are original and very interesting. Descriptions of the best of these toy models, we will publish from time to time.

A Toy Parachute

CLARENCE WOOD, age 11 years, tells us about a carnival in his town, where all the boys had toy parachutes. "They were made in bright colors, were accurately weighted, and made a beautiful picture floating about in the clear soft air. Most of the fellows bought their parachutes," Clarence goes on to say; "I made my own, and this is the way I did it: I took a light metal curtain ring and fastened eight small strings (as shown in the illustration) to it and to a circle of paper muslin 5 inches in diameter. From the curtain ring, I hung a small trapeze, and to it fastened a little tin man (a part of a toy wind-mill, but a pebble would have done just as well). My parachute was beautiful; but, how get it up into the air? That was the question that bothered me. All of a sudden, I thought of rolling it into a ball, and shooting it up in my rubber sling shot, and hurrah! hurrah! it was a dandy success."

Won the French model monoplane that will fly 300 feet.

A Successful Biplane Glider

A Birdlike Biplane Glider

By Anson Mapes Du Bois, age 14

THE main set of planes in this glider measures 2 feet in length by 6 inches square on the ends. The small planes are 2½ inches square on the ends by 12 inches long and 2 inches square by 6 inches long respectively. The boxes are made of strips cut from a 15-foot bamboo fishing-rod. The ends and parallel sides are covered with manila wrapping-paper strengthened with extra strips of bamboo. After getting the planes into shape (as per illustration), I prepared the skids—they are two pieces of bamboo 2 feet long, fastened under the main planes extending 1½ feet to the front. I then mounted the skids on small wheels, started the airship down hill, and to my amazement and joy, it rose and floated off like a bird.

Won "By Reef and Trail," a Christmas book.

To show off their bright new gowns;

And were waiting to catch their breath,

And smothered them to death.

"If You Want

Real Health and a

Study with Miss Cocroft."

(This is from one of my pupils to a friend)

My pupils are among the most refined, intellectual women of America. They have regained health and good figures and learned how to keep well. Each has given me a few minutes a day in the privacy of her own room to following scientific, hygienic principles of health, prescribed to suit each individual's needs.

No Drugs—No Medicines

My work has grown in favor because results are quick, natural and permanent and because they are scientific and appeal to common sense.

Be Well—nothing short of well.

Radiate Health so that every one with whom you come in contact is permeated with your strong spirit, your wholesome personality—feels better in body and mind for your very presence.

Be Attractive—well groomed.

Improve Your Figure—in other words be at your best. You wield a stronger influence for good, for education, for wholesome right living, if you are attractive and well, graceful and well poised—upright in body as well as in mind—and you are happier.

I want to help every woman to realize that her health lies, to a degree, in her own hands, and that she can reach her ideal in figure and poise.

Judge what I can do for you by what I have done for others.

I think I do not exaggerate when I say I have corrected more

Chronic Ailments and built up and reduced more women during the past nine years than any physician—the best physicians are my friends—their wives and daughters are my pupils.

I have Reduced about 25,000 women from 10 to 85 lbs. I have nourished and Increased the Weight of as many more—all this by strengthening nerves, heart, circulation, lungs and vital organs and by perfect assimilation of food.

Would you join us? we will make you and the world better.

[illegible]

Sit down and write to me NOW. Don't wait—you may forget it.

I have had a wonderful experience, and I would like to tell you about it.

face for an instant. It was evident that she was wondering at the sight of him there, pale and grave, but with an unfamiliar gentleness in his eyes and about his unsmiling lips.

"If you will," he said.

Read Barbara:

> I saw you toss the kites on high
> And blow the birds about the sky,
> And all around I heard you pass
> Like ladies' skirts across the grass—
> O wind, a-blowing all day long!
> O wind, that sings so loud a song!

Her voice flowing on like a brook over pebbles fell to a sudden silence, as the wind of which she had been reading entered with a sudden rush, swerving the yellow flame of the lamp to one side.

Jimmy laughed joyously.

"It's come in here," he said, turning a sleepily roguish face upon Jarvis, "to hear what you're saying, Barbara."

She closed the book and laid it quietly upon the table.

"You must go to bed now, Jimmy," she said.

The little boy whispered in her ear, his hands clasped about her neck. Her arm stole about his small body as she bent her head to listen. Jarvis watched the two hungrily—the child and the woman, and the eternal, unfading beauty of the picture smote him with almost intolerable poignancy. All that was best in life he had missed, blunderingly, blindly, and for what?

"I go to bed all by myself now," the little boy said proudly.

He walked toward the door; then turned, hesitated and flung himself upon Barbara.

"I guess I'd better kiss you good-night, Barb'ra," he cried. "Just think, I pretty near forgot!"

He beemed shyly upon Jarvis.

"Shall I shake hands with you?" he inquired with a friendly little smile. "I b'lieve I'd like to."

Jarvis held out his hand and Jimmy laid his own in it gravely. Barbara stirred uneasily in her chair.

"Jimmy dear!" she murmured softly, deprecatingly.

"I never sposed I'd be shakin' hands wiv you," the child went on calmly. "Did you drive that short-tailed horse?"

"Yes," said Jarvis, something swelling strangely within him as he looked down into the upturned face of the child, with its candid brown eyes.

"What made you cut his tail off?" demanded Jimmy. "Peg says it's a mean trick to cut off horses' tails, 'cause they need their tails to brush off the flies."

"Jimmy!" called Barbara again, her face crimsoning.

"I didn't cut it off," Jarvis replied, with every evidence of sincerity. "I bought the horse just that way. I don't like it myself."

He glanced up at Barbara with a quiet smile.

"I'm afraid I'm very much in the way," he said. "But I wanted to talk with you—on a matter of some importance."

XVII

A silence difficult to break settled upon the man and the maid, as Jimmy's plodding feet toiled up the stairs.

"Good-night, Barb'ra," his wistful little voice called from the top of the stairs.

"Good-night, Jimmy dear," she answered.

Her eyes clouded with pain sought Jarvis' face. She had suddenly leaped to the conclusion that he had come to tell her something concerning the contract; perhaps to inform her that her prolonged furlough was at an end.

His next words confirmed this.

"I believe," he said slowly, "that you are under bonds to leave your home for a considerable period. Five years, or thereabouts, to be exact. Am I right?"

"Yes," faltered Barbara. She had grown very pale. "That is why," she said bravely, "I have taught Jimmy to go upstairs alone. But he doesn't like it—yet."

Her eager eyes were fastened upon his face.

"Did you come—to—tell me? Must I go—now?" she asked.

He waved his hand deprecatingly.

"Oh, no," he said. "It isn't that—exactly. In fact I have nothing to do with the matter; only——"

He paused, as if to choose his words with care.

"I happen to know the person concerned in the transaction, and——"

"You know him?" breathed Barbara. She leaned toward him eagerly, the color coming back to her face in a swift flood. "Then won't you tell me——"

He shook his head.

"I'm under bonds to preserve my client's incognito," he said. "But——"

He looked at her compassionately.

"Are you finding the delay very hard to bear?" he asked. "Is there——" Again he hesitated. "Is there any particular reason why you should wish to know more about the matter? Any reason why you cannot wait my client's pleasure?"

She was silent.

"It is that I would like you to tell me," he went on deliberately. "I am instructed, by my client—to find out—to—er—ascertain, in short, if you are in any way dissatisfied with the present status of affairs. If you will be quite frank with me I shall greatly appreciate your confidence, and so will—the person I have the honor to represent. Of this I can speak very positively."

"Why," asked Barbara, her words coming with a rush, "do I wait at all? If my time is worth—all the money your client paid for it, why am I not working? That is one thing I want to know."

"As to that," Jarvis said quietly, "I can assure you that your time is worth all and more than you received for it. But——"

He looked down and fingered his driving gloves absent-mindedly.

"There have been certain events, transpiring since the date of your engagement—your agreement, I should say better—with the person of whom we are speaking, which would seem to indicate that possibly—mind, I say possibly, I cannot speak certainly as yet—but possibly your services may not be required at all."

"What must I do? Of course the money——"

"Naturally, a part of it will be forfeited to you," said Jarvis coolly.

To all outward appearance he was the hard-headed man of affairs discussing a disputed contract.

"I attended to that for you. It is nothing more than fair, since you hold yourself in readiness to fill your part of the contract."

Barbara was gazing at him with parted lips.

"I chanced to meet an acquaintance of yours this afternoon," Jarvis went on, his observant eyes on her face. "A—er—Mr. Whitcomb."

Her look puzzled him.

"He informed me that he wished to marry you."

The girl's eyes sank in shamed confusion.

"I—said I could not promise until—unless—" she faltered.

He arose, gripping his chair-back with tense fingers.

"It will be impossible to learn the ultimate intentions of my client at present," he said.

He continued to look at her as she sat in the soft radiance of the lamplight, her head bowed, her slender hands, browned and roughened by the labors of sorrowful years, tightly clasped in her lap; and a great compassion for her friendless youth, her woman's tenderness and weakness swept over him like a flood. He longed to take her in his arms, to comfort her unforgotten griefs and forever to shield her from the coldness of an unfriendly world. She seemed so slight, so fragile a creature in her thin dress of faded muslin, with the heavy masses of her hair knotted low against her slender neck.

"You say you cannot tell me who it is?" she murmured. "It is so strange not to know—to wait, being afraid every day. Why, any time Jimmy might come home and find me—gone."

Her voice trembled into silence.

He bent toward her, his face transfigured with love and pity.

"Barbara!" he cried, in a low voice of yearning.

She looked up at him, startled, afraid. He perceived this, and the next instant his features had resumed their expression of cold serenity.

"I was about to tell you that any excessive anxiety on your part is wholly unnecessary," he said. "You will certainly be notified at least a week in advance. And—as my client is situated at present, I think I may predict with tolerable certainty that the call will not come before—autumn."

Her face brightened.

"In October," she said, "we shall harvest the orchards. Then I could pay back the money."

A swift shadow crossed his face.

"Money; is it of that you must always be thinking?" he asked.

"You know that I must," she said proudly. "I could not rest under so heavy an obligation to—any one."

"No," he agreed. "I see that—I understand."

A melancholy smile touched his lips.

"Do not be alarmed as to the obligation," he said quickly. "My client is a man who is accustomed, like Shylock, to exact the last penny—even to the pound of flesh. He will not let you off easily."

Barbara drew a quick breath.

"It is a man, then?" she asked. "I—hoped——"

"You were hoping it was a woman," he said dryly. "I have committed an indiscretion in telling you so much. But—conceive, if you will, a man, well along in years, the guardian of a child, who requires——"

"Is the child," asked Barbara, "a boy or girl?"

He hesitated.

"—Er—I cannot tell you as to that. Let us suppose for the moment that it is a boy."

"Have you seen the child?"

He looked at her with what she would have called in another a bantering tenderness in his deep-set eyes. In connection with Stephen Jarvis the suggestion was untenable—absurd.

"Do you know you are cross-examining me with considerable adroitness?" he said. "I must be on my guard, or you will force me to tell you the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

"And why should you not tell me the truth?" she urged. "I think I have the right to know it."

"Not at present," he said coolly. "I am in honor bound to my client; you should remember I may lose my—er—commission, if I am not careful."

"I should be glad to know that the child is—that he is not an imbecile."

She answered his amazed look with swift explanation.

"A woman who saw my advertisement wanted me to take charge of an imbecile child; that is why——"

"And you would have done it, Barbara? You were ready to commit yourself to such a future, just because——"

He stopped short with a visible effort.

"No; the child is—he is a very dear and lovable little fellow, I should say. And he needs—you. He is—quite alone in the world."

"So," she murmured, "is Jimmy. And when I am gone there will be no one——"

"You will not be obliged to leave your brother right away, you know," he suggested. "And—possibly not at all."

Her face became illuminated with a sudden inspiration.

"Why shouldn't the man—this client of yours—bring the child here for me to take care of? I should be so glad to have him right away. This is a healthy spot. I could make him very comfortable."

Jarvis shook his head.

"I shouldn't like to suggest such a thing," he said slowly. "It might savor of impertinence——"

Her face crimsoned with mortification.

"I didn't mean——" she stammered.

"Not on your part," he amended hastily; "understand me, please. Your idea is—quite like you; quite what I should expect, knowing you as I do. But—I fear it wouldn't do. My client——"

"He must be a peculiar sort of person," hazarded Barbara.

"He is," agreed Jarvis. "So much so that—I feel I ought to warn you in one particular."

Barbara waited in expectant silence.

Jarvis hesitated, studying her downcast face.

"I want you to promise me," he said slowly, "that you will not yield to the importunities of—of Whitcomb. No; don't interrupt me. Hear me out. He will urge you to marry him—soon. He will tell you—. But you must not listen—yet. Do you hear me? You must—put him off. You must wait—till——"

"I shall wait," she said coldly, "till the man—your client is satisfied, or paid in full."

"Will you promise me this?"

She looked at him full in the eyes.

"Why should I promise you?" she demanded haughtily. "I have signed a contract. I am in honor bound to stand by it. I shall keep my word—fulfil the letter of my bond, but not because you have asked me to do it."

He turned abruptly and took up his hat.

"That is all I have to say to you," he said in a businesslike tone.

He stopped, hesitated.

"If I do not see you again——"

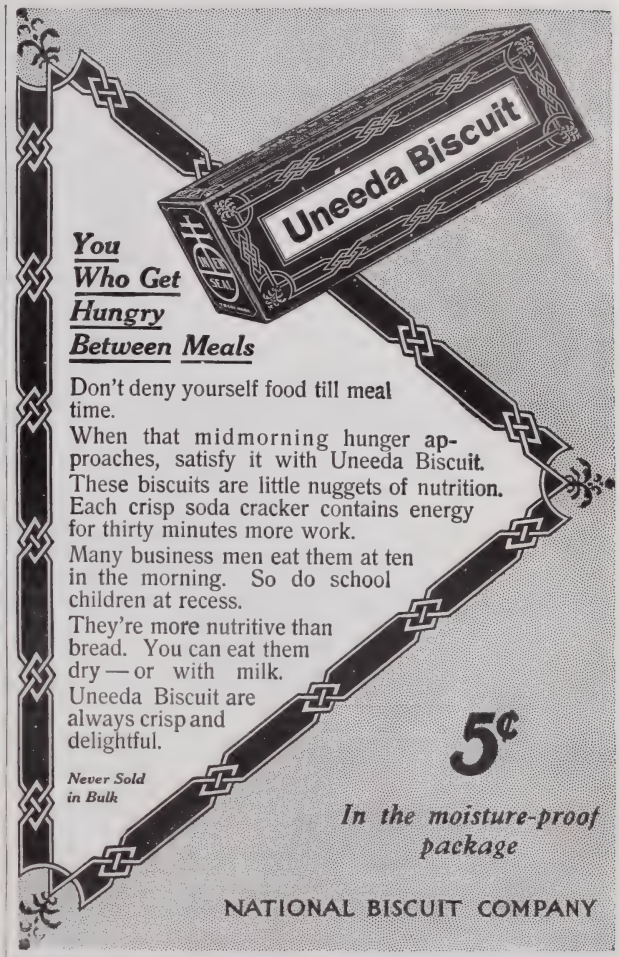
"But you will be obliged to see me," she objected, "to tell me."

"No," he said, and smiled silently. "I shall not need to see you again; and—I may not——"

He held out his hand.

"Will you forgive me, Barbara?" he asked humbly.

"Forgive you?" she echoed.



"God knows I have need of your forgiveness. If I do not—see you again, and it is quite possible that I may not. I am thinking of going away; of closing my house here. I may never return. But I want—I need to carry with me the certainty that you will sometimes think kindly of me. Not that I deserve it, but——"

OLD COMMON SENSE

Change Food When You Feel Out of Sorts

"A great deal depends upon yourself and the kind of food you eat," the wise old doctor said to a man who came to him sick with stomach trouble and side headache once or twice a week, and who had been taking pills and different medicines for three or four years.

He was induced to stop eating any sort of fried food or meat for breakfast, and was put on Grape-Nuts and cream, leaving off all medicines.

In a few days he began to get better, and now he has entirely recovered and writes that he is in better health than he has been before in twenty years. This man is 58 years old and says he feels "like a new man all the time."

The Story of Little Li Tei Pang

LI TEI PANG was the second of three children. His elder sister, according to custom, was betrothed while yet a small child, so when the father and mother both died of cholera, she was taken into the home into which she was by and by to go as a daughter-in-law. This arrangement left Li Tei Pang not only on his own resources at nine years of age, but also the only protection and support of his three-year-old brother.

Life to the little brother was indeed hard. Li Tei Pang braided the younger boy's queue, and did such other little acts of service as a sister would ordinarily perform. In regard to dress neither had much. Their tattered garments did service at night as their only bedding. They begged from door to door, and ate the bits of millet hoecake and such other poor food as was doled out to them by an unwilling people. For three winters they were kept from freezing by a kind-hearted distant relative, who allowed them to sleep in his stable with his donkey and dog. As the fourth winter drew on, they came to our gate and begged to be taken in. We gave them each two of the hard Chinese biscuits, and after considerable coaxing persuaded them to eat. (They had never before had such good food). After consultation we decided that we could take in Li Tei Pang, but could not care for one so small as the little brother. When we told the former our decision, he looked wistfully at a nice Chinese boy's suit, cap and shoes we had on hand. He then turned, and taking the little one by the hand, he stepped out at the gate, saying "Come, let's go." I said, "Aren't you going to stay?" He faced me with something akin to defiance in his eye, and glancing down at the little brother, said, "How can I leave him? He has no one to care for him but me."

I took them both in. But the younger brother could not recover from the hardships of those three terrible winters. After some three years of suffering he went to Him who is the Father of the fatherless.

Li Tei Pang united with the church shortly after coming to us and from the first manifested unusual earnestness and consecration. Almost from the beginning, he was the leader of a band of his fellow-students in devotional Bible study. From his fifteenth year, he has been preaching regularly, and although still in school, he is now, in his eighteenth year, one of our most effective preachers and successful soul-winners. We are able to care for this boy and keep him in school by the generosity of a Christian lady in America who is deeply interested in Tibet. But for the fact that Westerners are not allowed to live in that country, she would have opened a mission there. A few weeks ago, as I was returning from a country village where I had been preaching, I overtook Li Tei Pang and one of his fellow-students coming from a similar mission to another town. Li Tei Pang was assisting his friend, who had grown faint from overwork. I dismounted from my pony and helped the sick student to mount, then Li Tei Pang and I set off on foot. He informed me that for several years he had been impressed with the duty of giving his life to the evangelization of Tibet. He and one of his schoolmates (one of the best, most promising young men I have known in China) had gone alone in a quiet room and on their knees before God had pledged their lives to this work, with every sacrifice it involves. The Tibetans will not allow Europeans or Americans to live within their borders, but Chinese may live and travel in any part of the realm without hindrance.

Within a few years I expect to see this rescued waif, filled with the power of the omnipotent God, one of the greatest forces in winning the people of that darkened land to Jesus Christ.

and Canada; while literally tens of thousands of students in this and other lands secure through this study a new and fresh conception of the meaning and power of the Christian religion.

This breadth of view has helped also in making possible a popular Bible study movement among students, which now includes one-half of the cadets studying at West Point, 900 men at Yale, 1,019 students in the University of Toronto, 806 men at the University of Pennsylvania, 750 students at Tuskegee, and 552 students in New York City, a large proportion of whom are professional school students. All of these men are studying the Bible with system and regularity.

This new efficiency is beginning to react upon the Church as these students graduate and interest themselves in the various church Bible study movements of their communities. In short, trained leadership is the question of questions in the religious as well as in the political and social movements of our day. It is possible at present to enroll men and women by the hundreds in Bible classes. We find little difficulty in making an appeal to thinking men for Bible study, providing the right attitude is emphasized. It is not necessary to apologize for the Bible to-day.

The question of doing something with the members of a Bible class after we have enrolled them is the vital question. There is need of preparation of teachers who will understand the laws of developing and holding interest as well as the ability to interpret the subject matter of the Bible. Moreover, it is of immediate importance to reveal to thoughtful men and women the opportunity of using the Bible class as a means for helping individuals in all the varied needs of their personal lives.

I was much impressed recently by a young collegian who deliberately gave up practically all outside engagements for a year, in order that he might give himself utterly to the winning of a small but important group of students to the Christian life. He met these students each week in his own room; he applied Jesus' teaching to their own particular needs; he said to me: "I spend more time with the students themselves in personal conversation outside the class than I spend altogether in my preparation and in the class hour." In other words he was a successful Bible teacher through the employment of the method of friendship. A study of the Gospels leads one increasingly to believe that this friendly method was the root principle in the success of Jesus.

Life Building*

TOO often in our day we are admonished, if not in words, yet by implication, that the chief object of life should be the accumulation of property.

Series of books have been issued upon "successful" men, whose "success" has too often been measured in dollars alone. Some radicals have even told us that it is impossible to gain great wealth without resorting to unworthy means. We well know the words of our Lord upon this subject—that it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom.

But though there are undoubtedly many legitimate ways in which great fortunes are acquired, nevertheless the fact remains that the modern tendency is so greatly to overvalue mere wealth, that men have come to cherish a furtive feeling that people will forget and forgive devious ways of acquiring it, especially if it is spent with a showy regard to the public welfare.

It is necessary that every man should attend to his business assiduously, supporting his family in comfort and laying up adequate provision for illness and age; but the shocking examples recently presented to Americans of rich men who override insolently the laws of God and of men, indicate clearly the awful perils with which great wealth menaces the soul.

The successful man is he who, while not neglecting to provide well for his own household, holds lofty ideals of service to his fellows, and leaves behind him that "trail of light" which serves to point his fellow-men upward.

Most of those who have been of truest service to the world have never dreamed that they were to do a great work. Even while they were performing deeds which were to make them famous, they undervalued their achievements.

It is little by little; meeting discouragements bravely; laying one's hand to the opportunities of every day; never shirking; always doing one's best; that one usually mounts to the higher realms of endeavor and success.

But it is far easier to go downward than upward.

If one's progress upward is usually by small steps and scarcely traceable, it is even truer that one may go downward still more surely and by less perceptible steps.

Mark Guy Pearse tells of a company of hunters among the Scotch Highlands, who saw a group of sheep on a ledge of rock, extending out from the face of a precipice.

"How did they get there?" he asked one of the guides. "And how will they ever escape?"

"They get down so slowly that they don't know they are doing it," explained the Highlander. "They see a little grass on a ledge just below their pasture. They jump down to get it, and then they see a nice green patch just below that, and so they go down a trifle lower—and it requires a little effort to get back, so they take the easier path, which naturally leads downward. At last, they find themselves, like those sheep over there, in a place where they have to stop. They cannot go down further and they cannot climb back."

"What will they do?"

"They will be lost," said the guide composedly. "All our flocks suffer such losses from time to time. We expect them, and the best care can hardly prevent them. The eagles will swoop down on those lost sheep. The poor things will become mad with fright and hunger, and they will rush over the cliff and be dashed to pieces."

Let us build ever upward and beware of any downward step.

Prevailing Prayer*

WHEN we read of the great institutions like Dr. Cullis's "Home"; Muller's wonderful Home; some of the mission schools; and others, which are supported entirely by contributions from without, coming usually in direct answer to prayer, one longs to gain the secret of the faith of those prayers.

Dr. Torrey says that it is gained by constant, regular obedience to God's commands—the study of his Word, the practice of unceasing prayer, the utter yielding of our wills to his.

Those who have heard Dr. Torrey's marvelous stories of his own experience cannot doubt the efficacy of his prayers. All of us have probably had certain prayers almost miraculously answered. And yet sometimes the dearest prayers of all—the life of a beloved one—the preservation from evil of one who is tempted—the restoration of reason to a darkened mind—have not been granted.

We must rest back in such cases, upon the infallibility of our God. He knoweth our needs and meteth out to us accordingly of good and of evil.

And how many a time have we thanked God that he did not answer a certain prayer. In the light of after events, we could see that his way was best.

Horace Bushnell, in one of his great sermons to the students of Yale College, gave a vivid picture of the effect of prayer.

He describes a young man as gradually becoming cold to religion. He has been brought up aright, but he has wandered far from the faith of his fathers. The backsliding has been gradual, unconscious.

Suddenly conscience brings him up with a jerk. He realizes that the sacred images of his youth have become misty and unreal to him.

"He drops upon his knees and there he prays to the dim God, dimly felt, confessing the dimness for honesty's sake, and asking for help that he may begin a right life.

"It is a dark prayer, in the look of it, but the truest and best he can make; and it is so profoundly meant that his soul is borne up into God's help, as it were, by some unseen chariot. The whole sky is luminous about him. It is the morning, as it were, of a new eternity. He has found God."

It is likely that in this strong scene, the writer depicts his own soul awakening. Yet many a man has had a similar experience.

And you who read these lines—if you have pleaded at God's altar and have failed to receive the longed-for blessing, and have felt your faith shaking in consequence, go to your closet once more and pray on.

By prayer and yet more prayer, we learn the secret of faith. It cometh not by might or by power, but by the Spirit of God, and we gain the baptism of that Holy Spirit only by continual association.

The "pure in heart" see God. In his book, The Will of God, Henry B. Wright reminds us that only those who lose their lives in deeds of unselfishness "find it."

Do we fulfil all of Christ's conditions for prevailing prayer? Who can say that he does?

Beauty of a Clean Life*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

IT WAS wisely said by Dr. Henry Clay Trumbull that there are four things every Sunday School worker should KNOW, namely, the Bible, Christ, human nature and how to teach. Let us remember the Bible is an inspired revelation not only of the divine nature but also of human nature. It tells us of the doings of representative men and women not that we may know history, but that we may know ourselves. Ahab and Jezebel, Elijah and Elisha are brought on the historic stage that we may see how base and how noble human nature may become. We have known high officials to make mistakes disastrous to themselves and to their country because they have been trained to believe men were all good at heart, incapable of total depravity, and so modern Ahabs were allowed to hold the power they were abusing to selfish and sinful ends. On the other hand, many fail to do their duty in home and foreign missions because they do not realize that noblest characters may be developed by the grace of God from the most depraved families and races, as Asa from the family line of Rehoboam, and Ruth from Moab.

This lesson shows impressively the tendency of a wicked family, unsalted by the grace of God, to grow worse and worse. Jeroboam was bad, Omri worse, Ahab worst.

A man who cares little for himself and is willing to risk personal consequences of sin may be made to pause by showing him the long years of pain and shame his sin will entail on his wife and children, and his children's children. The world is coming back again to the study of heredity as the hell of habit. "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap; he that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption."

A Great Man's Great Sins

Omri was one of the most influential of Israel's kings. The Assyrians, down to Jehu's time, spoke of the kings of Israel as "the house of Omri," whose conquests are also immortalized on the Moabite Stone, which is of interest as one of many confirmations of the accuracy of Bible history. It is a question whether such a bad man should ever be called a "great man." No man who fails to develop his moral nature, the chief distinction between man and beast, can properly be called a great man. In Omri's case "the might that he showed" was not in self-mastery.

"Omri did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord." The God's-eye view of conduct is the right view. Reputation is what people think of us, character is what God knows of us. Men think of us sometimes as better, often as worse, and always as different from what we are. The God's eye view pierces to the thoughts and intents of the heart. It is a pity men do not always see that God's good opinion is the thing worth having. "In his sight shall no flesh be justified" save as they are "justified by faith through our Lord Jesus Christ."

Our Example Lives After Us

"He walked in all the way of Jeroboam." The founder of the kingdom of Israel was about half right. But the crooked copy he gave to his family grew even worse with each generation that followed it. A man's example lives on to do good or evil in his name for ages, sometimes forever. "Can I do something for you?" says the chaplain to the prisoner. "Can you undo something for me?" is the agonized reply. Every evil word heard, every evil thing seen is started out as a deathless curse.

"He made Israel to sin." Not alone our own life; not alone our own family, but our own country also, suffers when any man sins. Not personal reasons alone, but patriotic reasons urge a clean life. For example, in the great industrial race for the world's markets between Germany, Britain and the United States, the clear-seeing Emperor declares the victory will go to the soberest nation, and urges his beer-drinking students and workmen to join the Good Templars for their country's sake.

"Provoke Jehovah to anger with their vanities." Righteous indignation at sin is an essential characteristic of holiness. The Christian who is not "a good hater" of evil is like a man without a spinal column. Such a man is not Godlike and so not godly; he is not like the Christ of the whip of small cords and the two-edged sword, and so not a Christian. If he were he would not only love what God loves, but he would also hate what God hates. The Bible abounds in commands to "hate evil."

A Wicked Husband of a Wicked Wife

"Ahab did that which was evil in the sight of Jehovah above all who went before him." As if it had been a light thing for him to walk in the sins of Jeroboam, he took to wife Jezebel. Here we have a wicked man committing the great sin of marrying a still more wicked wife, as in the corresponding New Testament case of Herod and Herodias. There are more wicked men than wicked women, but when a woman starts out to be wicked, from a loftier height she falls to a lower depth.

Ahab committed many sins, but his marriage is named as the worst. He married a dancing priestess of Astarte, who was worshiped as the divine consort of Baal. The favorite sacrifice was the eldest son of a household. It is necessary to keep this in mind as we read of the severe punishment of idolatry in Old Testament times. To some of us in boyhood, who were only told of the image worship in ancient idolatry, death seemed an undue punishment for such an apparently harmless folly as bowing down to images of wood and stone. The punishments inflicted are seen in quite a different light when we know they were to save a whole people from those who wilfully sought to debauch them for the profit of corrupt priests.

Jeroboam and succeeding kings had introduced images only as symbols of Jehovah. Ahab, who was really the slave of Queen Jezebel, introduced the pagan gods Baal and Astarte and all their cruel and corrupt rites. He was the ripe and rotten fruitage of a bad ancestry and a bad marriage. And the devil's chief agent in his life was his wife. It is a warning against being "unequally yoked with unbelievers." That is forbidden to God's people, but one would never suppose God had said a word about it to see how ready most Christian girls are to marry anybody with money or rank, regardless of his character. And Christian young men commonly count it but a secondary matter whether a pretty girl has grace of heart as well as form.

There is nothing that can so assure joy for both worlds as a true Christian home; one like that of Bethany, to which Christ is ever welcome; where every sorrow is lessened by his words of comfort, and every feast brightened by his gladsome presence.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Mexico, Past and Present*

THIS is an exceptionally well-written book by Mr. W. E. Carson, who shows himself a keen student of both social and commercial conditions. The author kept eyes and ears open in his trip through the Southern Republic. His observations and impressions are set down in a clear, forceful manner. The book is a valuable contribution to our present stock of knowledge concerning a country which every day is looming larger on the horizon of our own affairs.

The evolution of Mexico has been rapid. Within the past quarter of a century this land has revivified herself from a sapless bough hanging to the withered trunk of the past, into a vigorous, lusty branch, putting forth the green leaves of a strong, national virility. Life has been sent surging through her system and its quickened pulse is beating in unison with a mighty progress.

The evolution of Mexico has been wonderful, her development amazing. Our "next door neighbor," she has copied our example from over the back fence, and by her own innate force has impelled herself to the front. In short, she has Americanized herself, and is Americanizing more and more every day. She has laid her foundations well and on them is erecting an edifice to withstand all outside onslaughts. She is developing racial and national characteristics that will serve her well as bulwarks in the future. Most of us are unaware of the progress of this country beside our own door, and it is not until some such book as Mr. Carson's falls into our hands that we wake up to fact and become enlightened as to the true state of affairs. The author introduces us to the Mexico of to-day; he shows her to us as she really is, without any frills or furbelows of exaggeration. He lets us see her in every phase of her national life; he points out the wonderful progress she has made since the olden time, he shows the conditions of labor, the status of the Church, and both the polity and policy of the government. He emphasizes the natural resources of the land—the possibilities and probabilities of mining and agriculture. The people of Mexico are brought before us as beings of flesh and blood; they talk to us through his book; they both show and tell us what they have done and what they hope yet to do.

Mr. Carson simply tells what he has seen. Above all, he is truthful; he gives no false impressions; he does not strain after effect, but keeps close to real conditions; hence the value of the book in giving dependable information. Those who wish to study the Wonderland of the South and view Mexico as she really is—and it is incumbent on all Americans to do so—should read Mr. Carson's book.

It is a pleasure to look over these records of a life which might better be called one of self-sacrifice than one of mere achievement. Surely never was a nobler nature than Louise Alcott's. Upon father, mother, sisters she poured treasures unstintingly, regardless of her own welfare. Miss Moses has been conscientious, if somewhat categorical and careless of literary niceties; and her pleasant book is the most complete account of this favorite writer and her works that the public has heretofore enjoyed.

Heavenly Heretics. By Lyman T. Powell, author of Christian Science; the Faith and Its Founder, The Art of Natural Sleep, The Emmanuel Movement in a New England Town, Family Prayers, etc. With Portraits. G. P. Channing, Horace Bushnell and Phillips Brooks. Each essay is prefaced by a page of "estimates," made by great men upon its subject; and each is followed by a brief bibliography. These, together with the fairly satisfactory portraits, add much to the value of the book.

HERE'S the place where two farmer's sons have built up a business of over $100,000 a year which tells how Roy Curtiss, a New York farmer's son, starting with a few neglected hens, has built up at the famous NIAGARA FARM the largest poultry plant in the world, with sales of over $100,000 a year.

READER: If you want to make money with poultry as the Curtiss brothers are making it, subscribe now for the FARM JOURNAL, and get with it the new

Curtiss Poultry Book

Roy wanted to make some money. He saw that the hens on the place were almost entirely neglected, and proposed that if his father (a grain merchant and farmer) would furnish the feed, he (Roy) would take care of the flock, and supply eggs and chickens for the farm table, and all that were left over were to belong to him. His father agreed and Roy went to work.

In two years he was using so much feed that his father had to cry quits, but the boy kept right on. He had grit and "go," just like your father's boys, and was determined to succeed. He would start at two o'clock A.M. for Niagara Falls, thirteen miles away, with poultry and eggs to sell. His brother joined him in the business, and it grew and grew. They took the farm, paid off the mortgage, built and added to their plant, learning slowly how to avoid losses and make profits. Their tender spring chickens and delicious ducklings captured the best hotel trade of Niagara Falls, Buffalo, and the Adirondacks, and they began to see "big things" in the poultry business.

But they had no guidance. They had to devise their own methods, and learn by their own mistakes. Such a guide as the CURTISS POULTRY BOOK would have saved them thousands of dollars and years of lost time.

This remarkable new book was written at Niagara Farm, by the veteran poultryman, MICHAEL K. BOYER. He had the Curtiss Brothers right at his elbow, with their records and data. He says he never saw a general poultry plant so well managed at every point. No "putting on style," no fancy buildings, no ornament, but straight, solid business. Everything is planned for months ahead. Every day shipments go off, every day money comes in. You could hardly believe how little they lose. Their percentage of fertile eggs, of live, strong chickens hatched, of day-old chicks shipped without loss even to Kansas or Florida, is really wonderful.

This book describes fully their methods of managing incubators, handling eggs, feeding, killing, dressing, packing, and marketing. It gives all their formulas for mixing feed for chickens and ducks at different ages. These formulas have been gradually modified and improved, until now they bring the best results with such certainty that, if you couldn't get them, they would be almost priceless. All these methods have been tested by years of experience, resulting in what is believed to be THE MOST PROFITABLE GENERAL POULTRY PLANT IN THE WORLD. Whether you raise chickens, ducks, or eggs, whether you keep forty fowls or forty thousand, you will find here help that you can get in no other way.

Have you use for such a book? Then read the special offer below.

The FARM JOURNAL (thirty-four years old) has over 750,000 subscribers, MORE THAN ANY OTHER FARM PAPER. It is of great value to everybody, in town or country, who wants to make money by growing fruit, vegetables, poultry, eggs, milk, butter, as well as grain and stock. It is a great favorite with mothers, housekeepers, boys and girls, as well as the men. "Cream, not skim-milk," is its motto. It is clean, brief, bright, "boiled down," intensely practical. It tells in a few words, and just at the right time, what to do NOW, and the best way to do it. It is now running a very interesting series, "Back to the Soil," stories of city people who have gone to the country to make a home. If you care about outdoor life, or plants, or pets, or children, or anything that grows, then, no matter how many other papers you get, you and your family ought to have the Farm Journal.

COMING

By Barbara Miller Macandrew

"IT may be in the evening,
When the work of the day is done,
And you have time to sit in the twilight
And watch the sinking sun,
While the long bright day dies slowly, over the sea
And the hour grows calm and holy with thoughts of me
While you hear the village children
Passing along the street,
Among those thronging footsteps
May come the sound of my feet.
Therefore I tell you: Watch,
By the light of the evening star,
When the room is growing dusky
As of clouds afar;
Let the door be on the latch in your home,
For it may be through the gloaming I will come.

"It may be when the midnight
Is heavy upon the land,
And the black waves lie dumbly
Along the sand;
When the moonless night draws close
And the lights are out in the house,
When the fires burn low and red,
And the watch is ticking loudly
Beside the bed;
Though you sleep tired out on your couch,
Still your heart must wake and watch in the dark room
For it may be that at midnight I will come.

"It may be at the cock-crow,
When the night is dying slowly
In the sky;
And the sea looks calm and holy
Waiting for the dawn of the golden sun
Which draweth nigh;
When the mists are on the valleys
Shading the river's chill,
And my morning star is fading, fading
Over the hill.
Behold, I say unto you: Watch,
Let the door be on the latch in your home.
In the chill before the dawning
Between the night and morning, I may come.

"It may be in the morning, when the sun is bright and strong,
And the dew is glittering sharply over the little lawn;
When the waves are laughing loudly along the shore
And the little birds are singing sweetly about the door.
With the long day's work before you, you rise up with the sun
And the neighbors come in to talk a little of all that must be done.
But remember that I may be the next to come in at the door,
To call you from your busy work for evermore.
As you work your heart must watch, for t.e door is on the latch in your room,
And it may be in the morning I will come."

So He passed down by my cottage garden, by the path that leads to the sea,
Till he came to the turn of the little road where the birch and laburnum tree
Lean over and arch the way; there I saw him a moment stay,
And turn once more to me, as I stood at the cottage door
And lift up his hands in blessing—then I saw his face no more.

And I stood still in the doorway, leaning against the wall,
Not heeding the fair white roses, though I crushed them and let them fall;
Only looking down the pathway, and looking toward the sea,
And wondering and wondering when he would come back for me;
Till I was aware of an angel, who was going swiftly by
With the gladness of one who goeth in the light of God most High.

He passed the end of the cottage toward the garden gate.
I suppose he was come down at the setting of the sun
To comfort some one in the village whose dwelling was desolate.
And he paused before the door, beside my place
And the likeness of a smile was on his face:
"Weep not," he said, "for unto you is given
To watch for the coming of his feet
Who is the glory of our blessed heaven.
The work and watching will be very sweet even in the earthly home,
And in such an hour as you think not He will come."

So I am watching quietly every day.
Whenever the sun shines brightly I rise and say:
"Surely it is the shining of his face."
And look unto the gates of his high place beyond the sea;
For I know he is coming shortly, to summon me,
And when a shadow falls across the window of my room
Where I am working my appointed task,
I lift my head and watch the door, and ask if He is come,
And the angel answers sweetly in my home:
"Only a few more shadows, and He will come."

The Baby and the Mission

IN the story of the life of George Grenfell, missionary and explorer in Africa, there is one incident which shows how the heart of the heathen may be reached through a little child. Mr. Grenfell built a mission steamer and called it Peace. On one occasion the Peace, with Holman Bentley on board, was roughly ordered away by the hostile natives of the Bolobo district. Before sheering off, however, an idea occurred to Bentley. Taking advantage of the steamer's halt, his nurse and wife were giving a bath to the Bentley baby. As if by accident, the little white boy was held up in view of the angry and excited people. Suddenly, a hush fell on the assembly of armed men, gradually giving way to a shout of delighted surprise. A few minutes afterwards, the Bentley baby, in a dainty white dress, was being paraded through the town, and dandled by warrior after warrior, till his sunny frock was reddened by camwood dye from their smeared faces. Mrs. Bentley, the first white woman the natives had seen, was equally the object of their astonishment. The little Bentley baby practically created the Bolobo Mission, which has endured for many years, and became Grenfell's principal residence from 1888 to 1906.

Four Generations

THESE four generations of a family named French are living on the soil in Reno County, Kansas. The great-grandfather, G. W. French, Sr., is now past 87, having been born in Indiana, October 20, 1823; but he is yet hale and hearty and expects to round out several more years. G. W. French, Jr., was also born in Indiana,

Four Kansas Generations

and is now 55 years old. The third generation is represented by Lonnie French, who was born in Kansas, August 11, 1881. The bright little boy is Ellis French, 18 months old, who looks healthy enough to keep up the prestige of the family and live to a good old age. The Frenches are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been taken in the family for the past twenty years.

Evangelist Jacobs Honored

AT THE noon hour on December 20, a beautiful and impressive service was held in the Fulton Street Prayer-meeting chapel, New York City, as a memorial of the late Rev. Frederick H. Jacobs, who for more than eight years served as superintendent of the Fulton Street Noon-day Prayer-meeting. There was a large attendance, both clerical and lay, and though a spirit of sadness was over all for the loss of one whom they loved, they were consoled by the thought of the good work he had accomplished and the noble example he had given to others.

Mr. William H. Van Steenbergh, chairman of the Fulton Street Prayer-meeting Committee, presided. In a beautiful address, he expressed the sorrow felt by his colleagues, and paid a high tribute to the zeal and the indefatigable efforts of the deceased.

The address by William Phillips Hall, popularly known as "the business man evangelist," stirred the hearts of the audience by calling up many loving memorials of Mr. Jacob's Christly life and the good deeds he had performed on behalf of his fellow-men.

After Mr. Hall's tribute there was a solo by Mr. I. H. Meredith, who also said a few words relative to the musical gifts of Mr. Jacobs, whom he pronounced "one of the finest Gospel singers in the country."

The Rev. J. G. Snyder, pastor of Olivet Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, next spoke. He feelingly referred to Mr. Jacobs as his "big brother," and said that he literally wore himself out working for others.

Dr. David James Burrell, pastor of the Marble Collegiate Church, New York, described Mr. Jacobs as one of the "sweet singers of Israel" and told how he could melt audiences to tears with the music of his voice.

The last address, which was a lengthy one, was delivered by Rev. Dr. Frederick W. Troy, a close evangelistic friend of the deceased. Dr. Troy told of his first meeting with Mr. Jacobs, and how their friendship grew stronger and stronger. He gave many instances of his own personal experience with Mr. Jacobs, and showed that his purpose in life was love and service.

All who testified knew Mr. Jacobs intimately, but there were others who knew the good work he had accomplished at the Fulton Street Noon-day Meetings.

—MR. D. W. GALL, of Washington, D. C., who was the victim of a recent severe accident, writes to his friends: "God has given me another lease of life, and I wish to do all I can in the line of duty. It is now the time of the year to forgive and forget; so let us, as members of a fraternal band, and Christians, forgive and forget past differences and with one accord do all in our power for the good of humanity." A beautiful and seasonable suggestion from one who has been near to death and who writes from a grateful and reverent heart.

CHRISTIAN MARTYRS GIVEN TO THE LIONS

CHRISTIANITY is the greatest fact in history. The early Christians endured martyrdom rather than forsake Principle. The picture shown herewith, from Ridpath's History, depicts 87,000 people assembled in the Coliseum at Rome to witness the Christians given to the lions. In such a scene may be read the inevitable doom of the Empire that ruled the world. The blood of the Martyrs is the seed from which Christian civilization sprang. If you would know the history of mankind—every sacrifice for principle, every struggle for liberty, every conflict and every achievement, from the dawn of civilization down to the present time--then embrace this splendid opportunity to place in your home the world-famed publication,

Presidents Endorse Ridpath

President McKinley said: "I am familiar with the merits of Ridpath's History of the World, and cordially commend it to the scholar as well as to the plain people generally."

President Harrison said: "The author's labors are deserving of the highest praise. The printing and binding is first class and the illustrations are of a high order. I most heartily recommend this great work for study and convenient reference."

President Cleveland said: "I unhesitatingly commend Ridpath's History of the World as a work of great merit, and believe that it should have a prominent place in every library."

NINE MASSIVE VOLUMES
2000 ILLUSTRATIONS

CHRISTIAN HERALD READERS have shown wonderful appreciation of our great offer. We have shipped this splendid history to delighted readers living in every State in the Union. Next to the Bible, this is in many respects the greatest work ever written. In the past 20 years over 200,000 sets have been sold at more than double our Special Price, and every purchaser is more than satisfied. More sets of Ridpath's History have been sold than of any other set of books in the English language. Can you imagine a greater testimonial for any work? The English-speaking world has endorsed Ridpath's as the only History of the World worth having.

RIDPATH in your home means you need never spend a lonely evening. You can associate with the world's heroes; you can cross the Rubicon with Cæsar, after which Rome was free no more. You can sit at the feet of Socrates, the loftiest genius of the ancient world. You can kneel at the shrine of Lincoln, "the greatest character of all time, the gentlest memory of our world." It is ennobling to commune with these children of destiny. To be associated with great is to be great one's self, and you will add to your store of knowledge which is power, and to the richness of your life.

Send Coupon To-day

RIDPATH takes you back to the dawn of history, long before the pyramids of Egypt were built; down through the romantic troubled times of Chaldea's grandeur and Assyria's magnificence; of Babylonia's wealth and luxury; of Grecian and Roman splendor; of Mohammedan culture and refinement; of French elegance and British power; of American patriotism and religious freedom, to the dawn of yesterday. He covers every race, every nation, every time, and holds you spellbound by his wonderful eloquence. Nothing more interesting, absorbing and inspiring was ever written.

RIDPATH throws the mantel of personality over the old heroes of history. Alexander is there—patriot, warrior, statesman, diplomat, crowning the glory of Grecian history. Xerxes, from his mountain platform, sees Themistocles, with three hundred and fifty Greek ships, smash his Persian fleet of over a thousand sail, and help to mould the language in which this paragraph is written. Rome perches Nero upon the greatest throne on earth, and so sets up a poor madman's name to stand for countless centuries as the synonym of savage cruelty; Napoleon fights Waterloo again under your very eyes, and reels before the iron fact that at last the end of his gilded dream has come. Bismarck is there—gruff, overbearing, a giant pugilist in the diplomatic ring, laughing with grim disdain at France, which says "You shall not." Washington is there, "four-square to all the winds," grave, thoughtful, proof against the wiles of British strategy and the poisoned darts of false friends; clear-seeing over the heads of his fellow-countrymen, and on into another century—the most colossal world-figure of his time!

I. A., Junction City, O. How many times did Christ appear after his resurrection? Give chapter and verse.

Ten times. 1. Mark 16: 9-11; John 20: 11-18. 2. Matt. 28: 8-10; Mark 16: 8; Luke 24: 9-11. 3. Luke 24: 34. 4. Mark 16: 12, 13; Luke 24: 13-35. 5. Mark 16: 14; Luke 24: 36-49; John 20: 19-23. 6. John 20: 24-29. 7. Matt. 28: 16-20; Mark 16: 15-18. 8. John 21: 1-24. 9. Matt. 28: 16. 10. Acts 1: 3-8.

J. O., Ipswich, S. D. Did Jesus, when he ascended to heaven, go in human form?

The visible resurrection was essential as a demonstration of his victory over death. The facts of the ascension are so well authenticated in numerous passages, that they are accepted by all denominations of the Christian Church. It was a bodily ascension, visible to the multitudes, as far as human eye could penetrate. What change may have occurred in the spiritualizing of his body, in its preparation for his place on God's right hand, we may only conjecture. The best commentators hold that "though Christ rose with the same body in which he died, it acquired, either at his resurrection or at his ascension, and without the loss of identity, the attributes of a spiritual body, as distinguished from a natural body; of an incorruptible, as distinguished from a corruptible body."

Subscriber, New York. What is the present tendency among orthodox believers in the Scriptures on the question of "inspiration"—that is, on the position of literal inspiration?

Among orthodox Christians, the belief in the inspiration of the Scriptures has undergone little change. They still hold them to be the Word of God, his message to mankind conveyed through holy men of old who were inspired by his Spirit. The Bible has come down to us through many languages and with many revisions and translations, but the message and the meaning were never lost sight of, nor have they ever been so clear as now, when consecrated scholarship has disposed of many imperfections and obscure passages in earlier translations. The Word of the message has always been perfect, though man's interpretation has at times misunderstood and obscured it.

N. R. S., Northfield, N. J. Please explain James 5: 14, 15. Is it wrong for us to call a physician, or use medicine?

Miraculous healing was one of the chief functions of the early church. It is, however, a usage which has long been discontinued in the Christian Church and is only found to-day in a few denominations. The connection of sin and disease appears in several Biblical passages. (See Ps. 103: 3; Isa. 33: 24; Matt. 9: 25; John 5: 14.)

D. B. T., Murphysboro, Ill. I would ask your opinion or rather explanation why was the tribe of Dan omitted in sealing of the tribes? (Rev. 7: 4.)

1. Dan was given to idolatry. This may have been a reason. 2. Some think that either Antichrist will spring from Dan, or that Dan will be Antichrist's especial tool.

J. S. B., Helena, Okla. Give short list of important events that have transpired on March 1.

First bank in United States chartered, 1780, territory of Illinois organized 1809, Georgetown College incorporated as Georgetown University 1815, Charles C. Bruce (negro), United States Senator, born 1841; Texas formally annexed 1845; Chihuahua, Mexico, occupied 1847.

M. B., Toronto, Can. 1. Are we told in the Bible that the body is the temple of the soul? 2. Please explain Matt. 13: 12. 3. If God is a spirit, how can man be made in the image of God?

1. We are told, in I. Cor. 3: 16 and 6: 19, that the body is "the temple of God" and "the temple of the Holy Ghost." 2. The passage referred to may be read with greater clearness, "shall be taken away even that which he seemeth to have," or, as it is in the Greek original, "thinketh he hath." Thus the semblance of religion without the reality is a manifest imposition, and, stripped of this semblance, the naked character appears. If we seem to have gifts or graces or qualities which are really only make-believe, the deprivation of this make-believe shows us in our true character, as we really are. 3. Man in the image of God does not mean likeness to his Maker in intellect or form, but in the moral dispositions of his soul, which has been called "original righteousness" (see Eccles. 7: 29). He fell from this condition, and the new creation under the Gospel is only a restoration of this image and the re-establishment of knowledge, righteousness, and true holiness.

D. R. C., Glasgow, Ky. Please reconcile Rom. 4: 5 and James 2: 17.

Abraham lived under the old dispensation and faith was accounted to him for righteousness; he had no sufficient justification by works in God's sight. He simply rested on God's promise. The passage in James means that true faith will always produce its fruit, i. e., works. The mere profession of faith, without resultant action, is hollow and insincere. If we love and trust a person, we will show it in our attitude and acts. If we believe in God, our sympathy for a suffering brother will not be satisfied with merely saying "Be warmed," but we will hasten to clothe him and help him to comfort. In other words, works, though not of themselves a means of saving grace, are the legitimate demonstration of genuine faith.

N. V. R., Birmingham, Mich. 1. To whom shall I refer for information concerning the naval academy at Annapolis, and military academy at West Point? 2. How do the seven world powers stand in regard to their naval strength?

1. For information concerning naval academy write to the chief of the Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, Washington; for West Point, write to Colonel Hugh L. Scott, U.S.N., Superintendent, West Point. 2. Great Britain, United States, Germany, Japan, France, Italy, Austria-Hungary.

W. H. F., Sycamore, Fla. 1. If the earth revolves around the sun, why did Joshua command the sun to stand still? 2. Did the first one who stepped into the pool at the troubling of the waters get healed?

1. Some commentators hold that the passage in Joshua is one in which the inspired historian departs from his narrative to introduce a highly poetic quotation—in other words, a poetical figure of speech not to be interpreted literally—as though one might say that "God and all nature fought on the side of Joshua." Again, the reference to the poetical book of Jasher as the source of this passage lends color to this explanation (Josh. 10: 13). Others prefer the literal view, regarding it as a miracle in which the hours when sun and moon were both visible (the sun on the heights of Gibeon at noon and the moon in the valley) were extended into a whole day or twelve hours of light (see MacDonald's Principia and the Bible), the continued radiance of both orbs lighting the battleground. Still another interpretation is that the sun and moon were heavily obscured by storm clouds (see verse 11), and that Joshua's prayer was that they should withhold their light and that the gloom or semi-darkness of the storm might last until the battle was fought, giving the Israelites the advantage of a surprise with smaller numbers, the strength of which the enemy could not properly estimate. 2. The first to bathe in the pool after the angel troubled the waters received the blessing of healing.

Obsequies of the Heroic Fire Chief Horan, who Perished in Chicago

HUNDREDS of thousands of sympathetic Chicagoans turned out to do honor to the memory of the hero who sacrificed himself in the cause of duty. The cortege passed through several of the principal streets between sidewalks lined with silent, sympathetic men and women, many of whom expressed their sorrow in sobs as the bier was borne by. Men reverently took off their hats to show their respect and pay a tribute to him who had given his life for his brother man. "What greater love than this can a man show, than that he give up his life for his fellow man?"

Mrs. S. S., of Greenview, Ill., a reader of this journal, sends us some interesting verses from which we quote these stanzas:

"Don't stop my paper, printer,
Don't strike my name off yet;
You know the times are stringent,
And dollars hard to get;
But I'll work a little harder
That's what I mean to do,
And get the dimes together,
And send them off to you.

"You can't tell how I miss it,
If it, by any fate,
Should happen not to reach us,
Or come a little late.
Then all is in a hubbub,
And things go all awry,
We cannot do without it;
You know the reason why.

"The young folks want to read it,
And I am anxious
At first to glance it over,
And then to read it through.
I cannot do without it,
It is no use to try,
For other people take it,
And, printer, so must I."

Miscellaneous

If F. L., Parkville, will write to the Baker Taylor Company, Union Square, New York City, she will receive the information she wishes.

W. Y. E., Holmesburg. We know of nothing better than the commentary by Jamieson, Faussett and Brown. You will find the subject fairly treated in any good Biblical encyclopedia.

A young woman in Virginia, the only support of an aged father and mother, appeals through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for help in a crisis. We will be glad to send her name and address to any reader who may desire to aid her.

R. A. F., Bentonville, Va. We cannot agree with you that the "rule of peace has already begun." Would it were so. The world is tending toward it, however. With regard to your other question, there are many interpretations of passages in Revelation, and many excellent commentaries on the subject accessible to every one who wishes to study it.

J. A. H., Meridian, Miss. The leading question in Famous Christian Testimonies was designed to bring out the fact that Christianity is steadily advancing, in the sense that the spirit and teaching of Christ are more and more recognized as an influence in business life and public affairs than at any previous time.

M. P., LaSalle, Mich. 1. There are many, nowadays, who flout at sacred things and pretend to believe that the Bible is old-fashioned and out of date. It is a pitiful thing to see professedly Christian people taking such an attitude. 2. Our views on dancing, card-playing, etc., have been too often explained to need repetition. 3. To one who doesn't want to go to church, any excuse is good enough to make him stay away.

R. G., Camden East, Ont. 1. Your questions are speculative. God's ways are not as our ways, and it is impossible for the human mind, with its many limitations, to explain the divine mind and purpose, except where they are intentionally made clear. All we know about the angels is very little: they are God's messengers, continually serving him. As to the fallen angels, the passages in Luke 10: 18; I. John 3: 8; Rev. 12: 7, 8, 9, practically comprise all we know, and beyond this the rest is mere legend and conjecture.

THE AMERICAN FLEET ON ITS HOMEWARD WAY AFTER ITS CRUISE IN FOREIGN WATERS

Copyright by the Pictorial News Co

OUR FLEET NOW HOMEWARD BOUND

AFTER a six weeks' sojourn, the Atlantic battleship fleet left the British Channel for home waters, December 30. Both men and officers thoroughly enjoyed themselves, and were cordially received in both the British and French capitals. In London particularly they got a royal welcome, there being many social entertainments and banquets for the officers. During the six weeks the vessels were in the Channel five hundred officers and twelve thousand of the crews visited the two cities, and in both created a most favorable impression, giving the English and French a high opinion of their gentlemanly conduct and distinguished bearing. No rowdyism, as is so often the case on shore leave, characterized the conduct of the men; they were sober, polite and courteous to all with whom they came in contact.

The Atlantic fleet is steaming over the waters as an "enemy," and a number of our shore cruisers and sea-board patrollers will meet it about mid-ocean. It is expected there will be a good deal of mock manœuvring to find out just what the possibilities might be in case a hostile foreign fleet attacked our shores. The theoretical safety of the Atlantic Coast against unexpected naval attack depends upon the fleet being located before it gets time to come dangerously near. In the event of the cruising scouters being unable to locate the incoming fleet or discovering it too late, the contention of many able naval officers will be confirmed that a foreign enemy's fleet could strike at some vital point on the coast before the defending vessels would waken up to the presence of the foe or know that a hostile force were in our waters fully prepared for attack.

If the cruisers do meet the home-coming fleet there will be much strategy on both sides, but of course the returning vessels will have to play the most difficult role, inasmuch as the "enemy" will be scouring the sea for them, while they will have no means to determine the position from which the cruisers will bear down on them. The returning squadron is heading for Guantanamo in Cuba, and if the scouts do not intercept them before they reach the Bahamas the chances are they will not be intercepted at all, as there are several passages through the Bahama Islands any one of which the fleet may take. The fleet is in command of Rear-Admiral Schroeder, a wily strategist and cunning tactician, who will do his utmost to play hide and seek with the watchers, and slip into Guantanamo to the latter's discomfiture, for he is one of the men who believe that the country could be approached by a foreign naval power unknown to its defenders. Rear-Admiral Sidney A. Staunton is at the head of the scouting fleet, and he will be equally on the alert to discover the approaching "foe." He will be acting the role of the country's protector, and will be on his mettle to show that it is impossible for a hostile fleet to come near our shores without the advance being known. He will direct the defense from his flagship, the cruiser Tennessee, and it will be his utmost concern to so manœuvre his scouters that the approaching fleet will not get past him under cover of the night time. Should Schroeder succeed in slipping past Staunton, it certainly would be a "victory" for the former.

It must be taken into consideration that the cruisers and scouters have a much greater speed than the battleships, and should the latter manage to pass in the night, the former would be able to quickly overhaul them after being sighted. The fleet must steam without coaling until Guantanamo is reached, and as the distance is about four thousand nautical miles, the vessels have to proceed at an economical speed, probably not more than ten knots an hour. Should a fog prevail on the waters, as is very likely at this season, the battleships will have a better chance of evading the lookout, but if the weather be clear the smoke from the great funnels will indicate the location of the fleet for a long distance. There is no way of dispelling this telltale evidence of position within a certain radius. The smoke hangs for hours in the sky as a pall, just like an index pointing the way the vessels, from which it arises, have taken. Should a ship pass in the night the morning reveals a spiral wreath of smoke in her wake.

Rear-Admiral Schroeder is well aware of the advantages possessed by those seeking to locate his ships, and the disadvantages under which he will have to labor to circumvent them, but a long experience in naval manœuvring has taught him tricks of which the layman can have no idea. 'Tis most difficult, however, for a fleet of giant ships, no matter how wary and skilful the commander, to escape a flotilla of fleet cruisers looking out for them from all sides. A stag has a hard time in the brushwood and trees of the forest in dodging a pack of keen-scented hounds. It will be remembered how the little Japanese cruisers located and kept track of the Russian fleet before the battle of the Sea of Japan. As soon as the cruisers believe the fleet is near at hand they will spread out, each one trying to cover as wide a sea-area as possible. Both cruisers and ships use wireless, and communicate daily with the Navy Department, but the receivers on the ships will not be able to detect the messages sent by the scouts, as the latter will use a pre-arranged code, which the fleet's operators will not understand, and which will therefore not arouse suspicion.

The return of the fleet is always looked forward to with much interest. Though we are a nation at peace with all the world and wish to maintain that much-to-be-desired attitude, we hold that it is our privilege to show that we are able to defend our rights as one of the greatest, if not the greatest, of the naval powers of the present day.

A SERMON BY

Rev. Frederick F. Shannon, D.D.*

THE HOUSE OF LIFE

TEXT: Luke 6:46—"And why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?"

"AND why call ye me, Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" Did you ever hear a more searching question than that? It means: Face about, and look yourself in the eye. Consider your profession and practice. See if there is any vital relation between them. If there is not, lightly tripping "Lord," "Lord," over the tip of your tongue is shallow and empty. There is no talismanic power in mere mumbling. It lacks the essence of reality. "Lord," "Lord," is the music, obedience is the instrument, you are the musician. When the instrument is in tune, and the musician in mood, then the melody of doing "the things which I say" flows on without interruption.

You see our Lord is giving us a study in spiritual architecture. After enunciating the principle of obedience, he illustrates its development in the parable of the true and false builders. Using the figure of a house, remember that it is the House of Life the Master has in mind. And remember, also, that the house of life is yours, and you are the builder. For these words were never more true than this very moment. Christ's words are unique in this: The older they grow, the newer and fresher they become. Their ancient splendor glows with a modern fire, and the heat at the centre is life eternal.

Of these two builders, let us take the false one first, then the true, and, finally, their similarities and contrasts.

I. The False Builder. "But he that heareth, and doeth not, is like a man that built a house upon the earth without a foundation; against which the stream brake, and straightway it fell in; and the ruin of that house was great."

First of all, then, the false builder's house lacks a foundation. "Well, what a fool!" you say. "That a man should undertake to build a house without a foundation—that is the acme of folly." And I think we are all agreed upon that. In your community, such a man would be taken in hand by the authorities, would he not? Why, such a man would soon wreck the real estate business! Moreover, there seems to be a deliberate wrong in this man's case. For he knew how to build a house. Christ affirms that he had heard that the plans and specifications were already in his hands.

The Divine Architect

Now, kindly note: Christ says—and this is the lesson we need to learn—that the man who hears his words (or, perchance, refuses to hear them), and does not live by them, is this false builder's spiritual double. And you know what a double is—he looks just like you. My friend, is your house of life foundationless? Or is it being built according to the plans of the divine Architect? Mind you, I do not ask if it is being constructed according to the latest fad in German theology, or if it rings with Emersonian aphorisms, or bristles with Darwinian evolutionoids, or sparkles with Spencerian synthetics, or blows with Eliotean psycho-brainstorms. We may safely and snugly tuck these away, for the time being. They are all well enough for their day, but their day is one of very short hours. For you and me, life's day hurries swiftly on to its close. The night cometh. Already the mystic bell in the vast cathedral of eternity may have tolled for us, even though its sound has not yet reached our ears. And I would not dare to enter that awful and unknown cathedral with a flickering taper in my hand. I fear one gust from out those unlit halls of immensity would quench it in fathomless night. No! I would have my lamp lit at the central fires of being—even by him who says: "I am the light of the world: he that followeth me shall not walk in the darkness, but shall have the light of life." Tell me: is your house of life lit up by the light of life? For he says: "I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me may not abide in the darkness." But if your house rests upon a false foundation, or upon any foundation save the Rock Christ Jesus, it will go down like a house of cards in the path of a cyclone.

For, mark you, because it lacks foundation, the false builder's house goes to speedy ruin: "Against which the stream brake, and straightway it fell in." Now, I am quite certain that this false builder, conscious though he was of having violated the building laws, thought his house looked pretty well. And probably it did. For favorable conditions help appearances wonderfully. Perhaps his house was set in a commanding position. Let us assume that the environment was all that the most fastidious purchaser could desire. Corner lot, Fifth Avenue frontage, facing park, no back alleys—splendid location! Why, even a house without a foundation might look well enough amid such surroundings on a clear day.

The Firm Foundation

Yes, on a clear day! But ah! what about the cloudy day? What about the day when the storm breaks, and the thunders roll, and the heavy atmosphere is ripped by swords of flame, and the winds scream as if ridden by demons of the night? What becomes of the house without a foundation then? Listen: "Against which the stream brake, and straightway it fell in!" You may not be aware of it, but the first thing the storm looks for is the foundation. I used to think it was the roof, or the walls. But one day a New York architect took me into the basement of the first skyscraper ever built in America. Pointing to a great girder, he said: "The stability of this building depends upon that." By the foundation, then, I do not mean merely that underground stonework supporting the superstructure. I include, also, that just and true proportion which must be maintained through all the various parts that bind the foundation and the superstructure together. And that is what the storm detective searches out. If false, rotten, lying materials have gone into the substance of the building, then straightway it falls in, when the storm smites it.

Furthermore, the false builder's house not only lacks foundation, and goes to sudden ruin because of that lack; but it tumbles suddenly into a great ruin: "And the ruin of that house was great." How great? Well, it is a just principle of interpretation, I think, to say that its ruin is proportioned by the value of the house. If the house is a cottage, its ruin may be complete, but not necessarily great. But if the house is a mansion, its ruin may be complete, and also great. Now, in getting at the possible ruin of your house of life, you are compelled to change your base of values altogether. Real estate standards can hardly be carried over into spiritual estate realities. Therefore, we may say at once, that the ruin of your house of life, the wreck of your soul, is just as much greater as in the scale of values spirit is higher than matter. You are made in the spiritual image of God. He who destroys that image is at heart an anarchist of Deity. "For the soul," says Drummond, "is in its highest sense a vast capacity for God. It is like a curious chamber added on to being, and somehow involving being—a chamber which may be expanded, with God as its guest, illimitably; but which, without God, shrinks and shrivels until every vestige of the divine is gone and God's image is left without God's Spirit." Think of it! God's image left without God's Spirit! A skeleton without flesh, a heart without blood, an eye without light, a brain without thought, an image without the Image-maker!

The True Builder

O brothers, there is no ruin like that known to God or man! God can pluck a few stars from the robes of space and never miss them. God can strike off a thousand years on the clock of eternity and never move a hand on the dial. God can scoop the bottoms out of the oceans and catch their waters in the hollow of his hand. God can touch the secret springs of gravity and make worlds gravitate the other way. But there is one thing God cannot do. He cannot look unmoved upon a house of life that has gone to ruin through the storms of sin. That is too great a loss for the all-loving and eternal God to behold. That sets awful aches surging through the divine heart. And so the hand of his almighty love hath reared a vast dome yonder in the temple of the heavens. In that dome he hath set the sweet chimes that are still ringing out their golden music to angels and men. And one chime trembles with the hope of Bethlehem, and one rings with the wail of Gethsemane, and one sobs with the agony of Calvary, and one shouts with the triumph of Joseph's tomb, and one thrills with the glory of Ascension Mount, and one prattles with the flaming speech of Pentecost, and one perpetually woos with the ever-abiding Spirit in the heart of the believer!

II. The True Builder. "Every one that cometh unto me, and heareth my words, and doeth them, I will show you to whom he is like: he is like a man building a house, who digged and went deep, and laid a foundation upon the rock: and when a flood arose, the stream brake against that house, and could not shake it: because it had been well builded."

First, then, the true builder's house has a foundation. But how did he get his foundation? I am glad the process is given. First, he digged; second, he kept digging; third, he digged and kept on digging until he reached the rock. "Who digged and went deep (the Greek reads, "kept deepening"), and laid a foundation upon the rock." Do you not see at once the suggestiveness relative to your house of life? Our religion somehow lacks the "digging" element. About the most we do is to raise the dust by scratching the surface. Is it not too true? We are experts on setting out posies. Do we know how to plant oaks? We know how to trail roses. Do we know how to sink vineyards? We know how to rear skyscrapers. Do we know how to build mansions for the skies? And we need not only to be diggers, but we need to be ceaseless diggers. "He kept deepening!" Ah, me! the true builder is at it, and always at it. He may give his body a summer vacation, but vacation his soul has none. He has found his Lord's secret sources of passion and power: "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work." He may retire from business, but from his Father's business he never retires. He is utterly unlike the character thus portrayed by a well known millionaire: "The trouble with the modern millionaire is—he has so much to retire from, and so little to retire to." It is just the reverse with the true builder. For, after living the life that is life indeed, so inexhaustible are the riches of the life hid with Christ in God, it may still be said of him: He has so little to retire from, and so much to retire to. That, my brethren, is the difference between a physical millionaire and a spiritual millionaire. And what constitutes the difference? Follow the true builder's process to the end: "Who digged and went deep, and laid a foundation upon the rock." You must go on down deeper than silver and gold and diamond mines, on and on until you strike the Rock of Ages. "For other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ."

The House Tried by Storm

Consider, also, that the true builder's house is unshaken by storm and flood: "And when a flood arose, the stream brake against that house and could not shake it." "Against that house?" you ask. "Yes." "But I thought that was the Christian's house. Do you mean to say, then, that the flood will try his house, too?" I say more than that, my friend. I say the storm not only tries the true builder's house, but that it was for the storm that the true builder built his house. Why did he dig and keep on deepening until he laid his foundation upon the rock? That he might produce a house that would turn the flies and mosquitoes and lightning bugs? No! He built a house that would shelter him in time of storm.

And now the storm is on. The sky is overcast. The darkness thickens. The thunders rumble. The lightnings crackle. The winds howl. The floods rage. The earth shudders. Fury is on the face of the deep, terror is on the face of the earth, horror is on the face of the heavens. Where is our true builder now? Why, yonder he stands at the window! See by the lightning's flash the smile of peace upon his face. He says: "This is magnificent! This is what I built my house for." But listen! His speech has broken into song:

> God moves in a mysterious way
> His wonders to perform;
> He plants his footsteps in the sea,
> And rides upon the storm.

Or, perhaps, he changes the tune, as he nestlingly sings:

> From every stormy wind that blows,
> From every swelling tide of woes,
> There is a calm, a sure retreat:
> 'Tis found beneath the mercy seat.

Then, the singing over, though the storm rages on, he exclaims with Paul: "But none of these things move me; neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the Gospel of the grace of God."

Now, why did the true builder's house weather the storm? Let me give you the secret in a sentence: "Because it had been well builded." Not a word is said about the location. It may have been on Rich Man's Avenue, on Poor Man's Alley, or on the knob of Lonesome Pine. But it weathered the storm because it had been well builded! Not a word is said about the appearance. It may have resembled a French chateau, a modern apartment, or a mountaineer's cabin. But it weathered the storm because it had been well builded! Not a word is said about its reputation. It may have been sought out by tourists, it may have been passed by in obscurity, or it may have been a rendezvous of the great—I do not know. All I know is: The true builder's house defied the storm because it had been well builded!

III. Finally, let me briefly point out the two builders' similarities and contrasts. Both heard—but oh, how differently! A brilliant woman recently said to me: "I enjoy good preaching. But somehow it fails to move me. Others seem to get more out of it than I do. I think I must be Gospel-hardened." What a confession, and what a tragedy, also! On the contrary, an old pilgrim said, with streaming cheeks: "Brother, the Gospel is manna to the hungry soul." Take heed how ye hear! Both heard, and both built—but oh, what strangely dissimilar houses they are! One is for the clear day only; one is for the sunshine and the storm. One is for time; one is for time and eternity. Both heard, both built, and both were tried—but oh, with what different results! One goes down in wreck and ruin; one stands unshaken while wreck and ruin are all around. And as no other in this universe has the right to do so, hear the Son of God speak of the ultimate issues of the true and false builders, and their house of life: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth him that sent me, hath eternal life, and cometh not into judgment, but hath passed out of death into life. Verily, verily, I say unto you, the hour cometh, and now is, when the dead [that is, the spiritually dead] shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live. For as the Father hath life in himself, even so gave he to the Son also to have life in himself: and he gave him authority to execute judgment, because he is a Son of man. Marvel not at this: for the hour cometh, in which all [that is, the good and bad dead] that are in the tombs shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of judgment."

Prayer: Almighty and ever living God, help us build our house of life aright. Thou hast given us the plans through thy Son, our Saviour. Chiefly, we thank thee for him, and then for our life's design. Help us to build for sunshine and storm, for time and for eternity. Grant that we may open all the windows of our house to thy sweet light and unfading glory. And when the earthly house of our tabernacle is dissolved, gently lift us, O gracious Father, into our house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Children's Pulpit

A BOX OF BLOCKS

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

HAVE you been waiting to hear? Waiting two weeks to hear something more about your Elbib Library? How am I to know just what you want to know? If you will ask me some questions I shall try to answer them. Wait, wait, not so many questions all at once. The first question I heard was: "How many books are in this Elbib Library?" I am quite sure you do not want me to tell you if you can find out for yourself. I will help you. The twenty-third book of the library is called Isaiah, and it has the same number of chapters as the library has books. Now you can answer your own question.

Men who study these books very carefully tell us that Isaiah is divided into two parts. The first part has thirty-nine chapters, and the second part has twenty-seven chapters. How many are thirty-nine and twenty-seven? Correct! Sixty-six, the same number as there are books in the Elbib Library. Like Isaiah, your library is divided into two parts, one called Old Testament and the other New Testament. The first has thirty-nine books and the second twenty-seven. Add thirty-nine and twenty-seven. Now read the answer backward. This will help you to remember the number of books in your Elbib.

THE second question you ask is: "Do you want us to read all the books in this library?" I am glad you asked this question. The book called Psalms is the only book that has over one hundred chapters. You can read it in four hours and thirty minutes. The first book, Genesis, you can read in three hours and a half. Matthew, Luke and Acts are the largest books in the New Testament. In two hours and fifteen minutes you can read one of them. John, the great book, you can read in less than two hours. In fifteen minutes you can read either First Peter, First John, First Timothy, or James. Have you just three minutes before the train starts? While waiting you can read the book of Philemon. If you set apart fifteen minutes each day you can read all the books in one year. You can read each and all of the sixty-six and have fifty-two days for review. There are many, many things to learn from each book. But you should read all of them, for the books were written to tell you many facts about one man. You must read all the books if you want to know all about this one man. His name is Christ. Speak a little louder, please! Now I hear: "Papa says it is the New Testament that tells us about Christ." That is true, but the Old Testament also tells us many things about this great and good Being. When Christ was with his disciples he took the Old Testament and "beginning with Moses and all the prophets he explained to them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself." That means that he told them how the Old Testament wrote about him without using his name. The Old and New Testaments tell us all about Christ. Now I think it is time for you to run out and play. Did I promise you a story? Then I must keep my promise.

NOT a long, long time ago a papa went to the city and brought home with him a box of blocks. He upset the box of blocks before the fireplace and gathered his little children about them and told them to put all the blocks together. He said there were sixty-six blocks, and if the children could get them all together they would solve a puzzle. Each block in its right place, and the puzzle is solved. Then he said, "Now, see if you can work the puzzle."

They tried it; one after another tried to put them together, but all failed. Once they had them almost together, but there was one block too many. They came to father and said: "There is one block too many. We are going to throw it into the fire." The father answered: "No, don't throw it into the fire, because these blocks must all go together. And so they went at it again and they got them all together, but not four-square. There was no block for one corner. "Papa, you must have lost one on the way." He said: "No, count them; you will find there are just sixty-six, and if you put them all together in the right way you will see them four-square. Then the puzzle will be solved."

At last one of the children noticed that on one of the blocks was a finger. That finger made one of the children think. Little children can think, and they can do more than think up mischief. They can think out many good things. This child began to think that if there is a finger there must be a hand, and if there is a hand there must be an arm. An arm hangs on one side of a body. Then began a search for the body. Down on their knees and all at work again. Here is the head; here is a foot; look, look; here is the other arm. Great excitement, and papa and mamma watching with delight. Soon they had the blocks all together four-square, and a man in the blocks smiling at them. "Careful, now," shouted papa; "turn them over and you will find your puzzle solved." When they found the man the puzzle was as easy as "rolling off a log."

SIXTY-SIX blocks; just the number of books in your Elbib Library! Something about a man on each block and something about Christ in each book! All the puzzle in each block solved when they are all put together!

I wonder if papa meant that the things they could not understand in some of their Elbib books could be easily understood when they read them all and found the man Christ? Take off your thinking cap, put on your play-cap, and oil your brain wheels with fresh air.

Next week we shall meet for another chat.

Bedouin Bandits

IN a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the startling experience was given of a party of tourists from Chicago who, while traveling in the Holy Land, were captured by Bedouin bandits. Details have now been received from which it appears that there were six in the party, viz.: A. C. Wieand, president of the Bethany Bible School, and his wife; Charles Ensenbise, superintendent of a mission; Miss Hattie Stadner, a student at the Bethany School, and Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Miller. The party were all condemned to die by Bedouins into whose hands they had fallen, following a successful attack by Arabs on the city of El Kerak in Syria. The timely arrival of a friendly tribe of Arabs, on the morning they were to be executed, saved them after they had been robbed. They were camping in a deserted building at El Kerak, the military capital of Moab, when the place was assaulted on December 12.

"We were busily occupied with our packing," Mr. Wieand writes, "when we were startled by a native helper rushing in and shouting that the Keraks had risen against the Turks. Soon we heard shouts at the other end of the city, followed by the firing of rifles. All day the fighting continued. At night the soldiers retired and the Arabs swarmed into the city. Most of us were asleep, when at about ten o'clock we were awakened by our guide. He brought in a sheik, who swore that he would protect us. On December 16 we started under escort toward the south end of the Dead Sea. About eleven o'clock we were overtaken by twenty wild Bedouins, generally known as the cutthroats of that region. They compelled our escort to give us up. At night our guide overheard them planning to lead us out the next day and kill us. Next day we were overtaken by the tribe to whom we were consigned. That night, we stole away as quietly as possible escorted by thirty horsemen. The following day we reached Jerusalem safely."

Campaign for a Million Souls

EARLY in 1909, some of the Southern Methodist missionaries at Songdo, Korea, realizing a coldness and lack of spiritual power in their lives, began to pray earnestly for a new quickening. "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled." Matt. 5: 6. After much individual prayer, a week of united prayer was agreed upon in July of the same year. The subject of the daily prayer meetings was prayer in its various aspects. On the fourth day the subject was "The Ministry of Intercession."

The prayer meeting was prolonged till midnight and by some even until four o'clock in the morning, at which time an indescribable outpouring of the Holy Spirit was received, a mighty blessing flowing therefrom. This blessing was shared with the other missionaries and the Korean Christians as well. From it grew the Methodist watchword for 1910: "Two hundred thousand souls for Jesus."

Group of Missionaries in Korea and their Children

The men and women here represented have reaped already a goodly harvest for Christ in the "Hermit Kingdom," and are daily bringing more souls under the banner of salvation.

At the annual meeting of the General Council of Protestant Missionaries in Korea, one of the members of the Southern Methodists who had received this blessing was led to propose the adoption of the watchword, "A million souls for Jesus in Korea in 1910." This was done and the watchword was adopted. Within a few hours after its adoption, Dr. Chapman, Mr. Alexander and party arrived in Seoul on their great evangelistic tour of the East. Their meetings brought a mighty blessing. At the last service Dr. Chapman, though apparently almost exhausted from their hard labors, preached from the text, "But first gave their own selves to the Lord" (II. Cor. 8: 5). Dr. Chapman told of his pastorate of a rich church, and how one day a plain man came to hear him preach, and after the sermon told him his sermon lacked the right ring, the evangelistic passion for souls. The plain man was Mr. D. L. Moody. Then a struggle to surrender to God came. One day Dr. Chapman read an address of Rev. F. B. Meyer in which he said, "If you are not willing to do what God wants you to, are you willing to be made willing?" Then Dr. Chapman surrendered and peace and power came into his life.

At the close of the meeting, at the invitation, many missionaries went forward and reconsecrated themselves to God and his service, without reserve. From this meeting, the missionaries went down to carry the blessing to Korea. Soon the watchword was taken up all over the land almost wherever there were Christians. Two members of the Chapman-Alexander party remained in Korea to help in the campaign, Mrs. E. A. R. Davis, founder of the Bible Success Band, and her son, Rev. George T. B. Davis, promoter of the Pocket Testament League. Mr. Davis visited many of the mission stations and enthusiastically presented the plan to give away the Word of God in doing personal work, telling how God had honored his Word in the conversion of many a sinner from reading the Bible or Testament. Largely as a result of Mr. Davis' visit, some six hundred thousand copies of the special edition of the Gospel according to Mark were given away in a few months—an unprecedented event in the history of missions. In addition some 70,000 days of personal evangelistic service were pledged by the Christians, or nearly two hundred years of personal work. Thus the seed-sowing was kept up for months.

In addition, special evangelistic services were held at different places. Rev. Fred Vesey, of the British and Foreign Bible Society, with a party of colporters visited practically every home in the city of Seoul during the hot and unhealthy summer months. Portions of the Word were sold, tracts distributed and the way of salvation explained and the people urged to believe in Jesus and be saved.

All this work was in preparation for the campaign of the fall months. At the meeting of presbytery, after a strong appeal by Kil Moksa, one of the Korean pastors, a plan was adopted to begin in Seoul, in October, a month's campaign. Missionaries from other stations and Korean helpers were called in to help. The city had been divided into districts and these districts were assigned to Christian workers. These workers visited the people in their homes, day after day, and urged them to believe in Jesus. Many thus invited attended the evening services and confessed their desire to be Christians. Each of fourteen churches was the centre for these meetings. Thousands confessed their belief.

Then, after the Seoul campaign, these hundreds of Christian workers returned to their own stations and a similar campaign was there carried out. Four men from each country group were invited in to the central station, and there a similar campaign to the one in Seoul was carried out, and after the station meetings were over, back to the country went the workers. So the effort was to enlist every Christian worker, and, as far as possible, visit every home and reach every available person with the message of the Gospel as it is in Jesus. The prayer was even made that every one of the 2,400,000 homes might be thus visited and every one of the 12,000,000 people in Korea receive an intelligent presentation of the Gospel this year, and be won for Jesus. Thousands have confessed their desire to be Christians. The great work of following up this is now in order, enrolling the new believers in Bible classes, for the Bible has been, under God's blessing, the mighty factor of the success of the work in Korea, with the Holy Spirit leading and blessing the work.

Native Christian Helpers in Korea

It is hoped that the campaign will be an annual one, until all in Korea are evangelized and won for Jesus Christ. A great multitude still remain to be won. This calls for redoubled effort on the part of all missionaries, and an increased force of workers on the field at the earliest possible time.

This campaign for a million souls has been a mighty stimulus to the Christians in Korea and elsewhere, based as it is upon the study of God's Word and its distribution, until all shall have this priceless treasure of eternal truth. Its origin was in prayer and it must be sustained through prayer, united, prevailing, intercessory prayer. And with these two, the Word of God and prayer, is a third factor—personal winning of souls. Each Christian is a soul-winner. Visiting the people in their own homes has given the Christian workers a mighty hold upon them. It is but the application of Paul's words at Ephesus, "And how I kept back nothing that was profitable unto you, and have taught you publicly and from house to house."

Will you not make THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a great missionary advocate, filling its pages with news from the battle and awakening the whole church to action now? The call of urgency, or rather of Christian emergency, should be rung into the hearts of every Christian, until every will is aflame with the supreme purpose to make the knowledge of the love of God, as manifested in Jesus Christ, as universal as the sunshine and the fresh air. Vast territories and millions of people yet lie untouched by a single missionary of the Cross, and that even in lands that are occupied, in many cases only a beginning has been made. Surely this sad condition calls for our supreme efforts.

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—THE LARGEST consignment of postage stamps ever sent out in this or any other country to one place was shipped from Washington to Chicago on January 4. There were 72,500,000 stamps, having a face value of $1,522,000. Two million five-cent stamps were in the consignment, the largest order ever received for that denomination.

—TWO BROTHERS, James and Thomas Baird, came from England two years ago. After working together for six months they drifted apart and lost track of each other until last New Year's night, when both met in a Chicago bread line. Neither had prospered, and adversity, by some strange chance, had thrown them together again after their long separation.

—A FRENCH economist has estimated that to maintain the armies of Europe on a peace footing has cost twenty-nine billion dollars within the past twenty-five years, thus increasing the public debt of the European States from $20,000,000,000 to $30,000,000,000, and excluding from productive industry 195,000 officers and 3,800,000 men. International arbitration would greatly reduce this grievous burden, which is oppressive even in the "piping times of peace."

—A MEASURE has been drafted which will be introduced as a bill at the next session of the English Parliament with the object of abolishing the gallows as the form of capital punishment in Great Britain. It is proposed to substitute some strictly private form of despatch of condemned men in their cells, such as the administering of an anæsthetic, or some drug that will cause death as swiftly and painlessly as possible.

—THERE IS ONE night in all the year when New York gives way to mid-winter revel. It is New Year's Eve. This year, it has been estimated that the revelers on that one night spent $1,500,000 for food and wine, $170,000 for theatres, $50,000 for candy, $75,000 for flowers, $10,000 for cigars, and when it was all over, over 100,000 revelers, after having what they called "a good time," woke next morning with headaches and a hazy recollection of having made fools of themselves. We are not among those who believe there should be no merriment in life, but surely there is a limit to gayety. The "feast of unreason," in its wildest form, never cost half as much as New York squanders on that single night of the year. The saturnalian revel is surely the poorest way of showing one's gratitude to God at the passing of the year for all the blessings that have been enjoyed at his hand during the months that have gone. We lead all countries in the world in this culminating orgy of the year.

I received the book of Dr. Klopsch's life work and think it is fine. I hope the time will come when your splendid paper will be in every home, for I know of no other paper that is so good for a home paper as THE HERALD. I should not know how to get along without it. MRS. J. V.

Help for Famine-Stricken China

Natives at a Relief Station in the Famine District, with Officials Preserving Order

THAT our government and people are prompt in their response to China's appeal for help in her new famine visitation, is shown by the following official telegram from the Secretary of State:

"Department of State,
"Washington, January 4, 1911.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,
Bible House, New York City.

"Referring to the telegrams exchanged between the Department and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, relative to the famine in China, I beg to inform you that the Department has instructed the American minister at Peking to pay to the Reverend W. C. Longden, Chairman of the Missionary Committee at Chinkiang, China, the $1,000 contributed by you.

"P. C. KNOX."

As the Missionary Committee at Chinkiang is in direct contact with the famine section and familiar with every detail of relief work, it is safe to assume that even before this issue reaches the hands of our readers, the first remittance through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD representing their gifts, will have been converted into food for the hungry ones and distributed among the sufferers. Through the kindness of our State Department, these wonderful facilities are placed at the disposal of the readers of this journal, that their benevolences may literally fly with the swiftness of lightning to succor the suffering in the remotest parts of the globe. It is earnestly hoped that the appeal of stricken China, sent through the missionaries, may meet with a prompt and liberal response. Her sad condition has touched the heart of Christian America.

Many letters from readers of this journal express deep sympathy and offer help. Almost every letter breathes a fervent prayer that the famine may soon abate and the suffering be quickly relieved. Mr. C. S., of Columbus, Kan., sends a contribution to the relief fund, "with the prayer that Christ will touch the hearts of men more able to help the sufferers." "Two Friends," of Cabinet, O. ($2), write: "We hope it will do somebody good, both in soul and body." Coral H. Blackwell, Okla., sends an offering of $3, which will well nigh keep one starving family in food for a whole month. A. L., Los Angeles, Calif., sends $1, which will provide enough flour or rice to keep the inmates of a Chinese peasant home for ten days or even more. H. H., Salem, Ore., sends, "In God's name," a gift of $20, which will be a blessing to many, and will doubtless be the means of saving precious lives. "I have just read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the famine in China," writes Miss E. A. E., Winona, Minn. "I enclose $1 for them; I wish I could do more." Another reader, Mrs. R. J. B., Avoca, Ia., sends $5 "as a thank-offering promised when a daughter lay very ill," and who was graciously restored. Her thank-offering will make a whole household in distant China thankful for the food that this gift will supply.

A letter from Rev. Edwin C. Lobenstine, a Presbyterian missionary, in one section of the famine district, says:

"We are passing through another time of famine here. The past years have been marked by repeated floods and this year both the spring and fall crops have been an almost total failure in large sections. In this particular section, a region thirty-three miles wide by nearly fifty-seven miles long has been swept by the worst floods in the memory of man. The people lost everything they had. The imperial government has voted 40,000 taels for the twelve devastated counties, but it is a mere drop in the bucket.

"Taking China as a whole, this particular district flooded is a small one; but there also are famine conditions in other parts of China, and the imperial government is in such straits financially that it is very much to be feared that adequate assistance can not be given. At the best it will be only temporary and will not strike at the real difficulty. The people are desperate. It is hard to preach a Gospel of love to those who are starving, and on the verge thereof, unless at the same time one can help their physical needs."

A representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who visited the Chinese Legation in Washington, talked with His Excellency Chang-Yin-Tang, the Chinese Minister, and the First Secretary of Legation, concerning the famine. Both were very much interested in the efforts of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to respond to the plea for relief made to it through the missionaries. The Minister's latest dispatches from China confirm the most serious reports of famine. It extends throughout three provinces and, according to further advices, upwards of two million people are suffering terrible privations. The government has begun relief measures, which are in charge of a high official, who disburses a fund which the government has appropriated, but which is inadequate to meet the emergency. Already the situation is so serious, and so many months must pass before another crop can be harvested, that very great suffering is unavoidable.

Minister Chang was deeply touched by the fact that the American people are again willing to help the famine-stricken provinces of China, and expressed warm appreciation of the generosity of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. He spoke feelingly of Dr. Klopsch's splendid work in the past and of the great usefulness of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in philanthropic efforts for the benefit of suffering humanity.

Gospel Progress at Wuhu, China

OUR first out-station mission work in China was at Han Shan, where we needed funds for our new church. We stated our needs and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers responded, and we had enough in a short time to complete the building. Then we needed a chapel and school building at Chao Hsien, and a lady reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent the full amount for it, naming the building after her father. This city of Chao Hsien had refused admittance to all foreign missionaries for years, and was called the most anti-foreign city in Central China; yet we were allowed the privilege of opening up this city, because we had helped in relieving the famine sufferers of 1901 from funds sent out by your paper for them. This is the reason why Chao Hsien opened her gates to the Gospel and

ON THIS page we publish a communication from a reader in South Dakota, who makes a suggestion concerning the popular memorial to the late Dr. Klopsch. Last week we invited our readers to send us their views briefly on the memorial proposition made by a Pittsburg subscriber to "make Mont-Lawn Dr. Klopsch's monument." We now renew the invitation, and will be glad to hear from all who are interested in the movement looking to the endowment of the Children's Home, which was Dr. Klopsch's favorite charity, as a lasting memorial to his great work for humanity.

A Great Anniversary

THREE hundred years ago the Authorized Version of the Holy Bible was given to the world. This epochal event is worthy of being commemorated throughout all civilized lands, wherever the Word of God is read. That it will be commemorated in a distinctive manner, both in Great Britain and in this country, before the year is much older, is highly probable.

At the time of the issuance of the Authorized Version, religious differences were very marked among the subjects of King James VI. He found himself reigning over three countries, each professing a different religion. England was Anglican, or Episcopal; Scotland was Presbyterian, or Puritan; Ireland was Catholic. Each country retained its own church and its own laws. Amid all the social and civil turmoil, the King did one good thing, for which the world will ever hold him in grateful remembrance: he decided that his subjects should have a uniform Bible; and so, setting aside all three versions then in use—the Geneva Bible, the Bishop's Bible, and the great Bible of Coverdale, Tyndale and Matthew—he authorized a fresh translation and revision of the entire Scriptures. He summoned to this work the consecrated scholarship of that age, and although the eminent divines and professors who labored lovingly and reverently at their task did not have access to the Bible manuscripts of the Alexandrian library (which were not available until 1628) nor to the MS. found by Tischendorf (which were not discovered until 1859), nor to the Vatican manuscripts, they produced the Bible which in those three hundred years has grown to be the most precious of all books. It holds the highest place in sacred literature. It has been the spiritual guide of our fathers and forefathers for generations.

Modern scholarship, in dealing with any new revision or translation, has dealt reverently with the old Bible, which for three centuries has stood as the very Word of God to all true believers.

It is to be hoped that whatever form the celebration of the three hundredth anniversary of the Authorized Version should assume, here or abroad, it will be one in which every Bible-lover will be able to have a part. It would be a great personal pleasure and privilege to share in a popular tribute of appreciation of the old Bible which has done so much to transform heathendom into Christendom, and to bring countless millions into the light of the Gospel: the old Bible, by which our fathers and mothers and their forefathers lived, and which gave to them the hope of a blessed hereafter.

Aerial Sacrifices

OUR progressive world is just entering on the age of flight. Aviators are learning at what a cost of human life the conquest of the air must be won. In a single year, over thirty lives have been sacrificed, some through ambitious demonstration, others in consequence of imperfect mechanism, but all as a part of the price man has to pay in every struggle with the elemental forces of nature before he is victor. In every struggle for progress, life is cast into the balance. It is an inflexible law that nothing is to be accomplished that will be of value to the world except through sacrifice. In exploration, in mechanics, medicine, surgery, explosives, submarines, bridge-building, tunneling, and in many other lines along which man's ingenuity and inventiveness have led him to experiment, the path is marked by sacrifice. Privation, peril, death are all part of the price the race must pay for its progress. Johnstone, Moisant, Hoxsey and the long list of those birdmen who have become victims of the aeroplane, were worthy pioneers, who showed us the way. Thousands of others are ready to take their places. Every failure will be a stepping stone to success, and the day will come when a journey through the air in à perfect machine, under constant control, will be as safe as traveling by rail or steamer. It is a great battle and hazardous, but man will finally triumph, as he has done in innumerable other lines of human achievement.

A Friend of Temperance

IN THE death of William T. Wardwell, the cause of temperance has sustained the loss of one of its principal leaders. Mr. Wardwell was highly successful as a business man and he put his wealth to excellent purpose, in advancing the Prohibition movement throughout the country. Under the "sign of the fountain," he ran for mayor of New York City twenty-five years ago, and received the conscience vote. Ten years ago, he accepted the Prohibition nomination for governor of New York and had a substantial following. He was a citizen of high principle, abounding in generous deeds. His name was on the directorate of many charities, and he was a member of numerous business, civic, scientific and patriotic organizations. His whole career was a fine illustration of the combination of business ability and high ideals, and in the fourscore-and-four years of his life, he accomplished much good, which deserves to be remembered.

The People's Reading Matter

NEWS comes from Washington that the administration is determined in its purpose to raise the rate on second-class postal matter and that a bill may soon be introduced in Congress providing for increased rates, or an amendment to that end will be added to the general appropriation bill. This is a matter that interests not one class of citizens but the whole people. Canada carries its newspapers and magazines at one-fourth of a cent per pound. Formerly the Canadian rate was half a cent, but the Postal Department, finding that it could do it even more cheaply, having the people's interest in view, cut the rate in half and finds it still profitable. Our present rate is just four times the Canadian figure.

Now, our administration's proposition has undergone a change. Unable to show any good and sufficient reason why our Postal Department cannot carry the magazines and weeklies without loss, though charging four times as much as Canada, the advocates of higher postage propose to fix a rate distributed between text and advertising, which is merely a subterfuge in view of the obvious fact that advertisements are indirectly the best possible source of postal revenue, as every advertisement produces a volume of mail correspondence at regular letter rates. But a scapegoat must be found for the postal deficit, and the magazines—the popular literature of the people—have been chosen as the victim.

There is not a single good reason for inflicting this unnecessary hardship upon the publishers. Other and far better means of increasing the postal revenue are open to the department. The present arrangement with the transportation companies can and ought to be revised. Opposition by the express companies to the establishment of a profitable parcels post should be swept aside. The people should not be made to suffer for the government's indifference to these palpable opportunities, for it is on the people that the proposed increased tax would ultimately fall, as magazines and weeklies are at bottom rates already. To tax them still more heavily for postage would practically mean to wipe out the weaker publications and inflict a serious blow even upon the stronger ones. It would necessitate a general increase in prices and would therefore be a direct tax upon the people of the country—a tax to cover up the financial strabismus of the Postal Department, which has other sources of increasing its revenues available.

We cannot believe that President Taft or the members of the Postal Committee of Congress, realizing these facts, would willingly impose a tax upon the millions of magazine readers, if they knew the feeling of the people themselves on this matter. These views should be laid before them immediately. Let every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD write to some one member of the Postal Committee (whose names are given below) a brief letter urging that the postal rate on magazines should not be increased, as it would ultimately be putting a prohibitive tax on the reading matter of millions of readers throughout the country, and would be a special hardship on those who live in rural districts. Do this at once, in order that it may be effective. Your letter, with thousands of others, will aid in preventing the consummation of a great injustice.

The Value of Quick Relief

THROUGH the courtesy of our State Department in Washington, the first remittance of $1,000, advanced by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in anticipation of contributions, has been cabled to China and is now being expended through the Missionary Committee at Chinkiang for the benefit of the famine sufferers. This is quick relief. It is most gratifying to know that our government, in the multitude of its important official affairs, can still give ear to the plea of suffering, and assist a movement of this character. It gave most valuable aid to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the famine relief campaigns in Japan, India, Cuba, and the Northland, and thereby earned the gratitude of the generous-hearted American people, whose gifts it forwarded through official channels. There is every indication that the famine now prevailing in China will attain much more extensive proportions before the next crop can be harvested, three months hence. Let us do all we can to help these suffering people to tide over the time of stress. A dollar given now may save a human life. Send in your gift quickly to the "China Famine Fund," Bible House, New York.

MONT-LAWN HIS MONUMENT

DEAR EDITOR: I want to say a few words in regard to our good friend, Dr. Klopsch, who has gone to his reward. That future generations may know him as we knew him, as the almoner of all those in distress and starving, I think there should be a monument erected. Let it be at Mont-Lawn, on the grounds he loved so well, and let the patrons of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have the privilege of contributing to pay the cost. If all the money is not used, let it be given to some benevolent object. Let his name be coupled with those of Washington and Lincoln, as the three greatest and best loved Americans.

Sincerely yours,
Platte, S. D. F. W. TUCKERMAN.

Remarkable Telegraph Invention

IN THE early part of December, 1910, a demonstration was held at Florence, Italy, in the presence of scientific authorities, of a new apparatus for multiple telegraphing. This was invented by Corrado Andrini. It was given the finishing touches by the engineer Luis Maino, chief of the technical department of the Italian government telegraph service. This invention is used for transmitting and receiving the Morse system. It can send ten telegrams at the same time. Each touch puts in movement a vibration which sends over the line ultimate currents of high potentiality with unvarying and established periods. These currents are received at the station to which they are sent by a special mechanism and based on the different Morse telegraph apparatus. With the Andrini system it is possible to send from ten to fifteen telegrams at the same time and the same circuit. This makes possible from 300 to 800 telegrams an hour; the original line being able to handle only from thirty to forty. The invention needs only a simple and inexpensive installation and does not interfere with, but rather supplements, the telegraph system already in use. The remarkable value of this is easily understood, especially in its relation to newspapers, etc. When Professor Samuel Morse invented the electric telegraph and was notified that Congress had granted him $30,000 for the construction of a little line from Baltimore to Washington, he permitted a young lady friend to send the first message over the wire, and this was the one she sent: "What hath God wrought?". In his intellectual conceptions and in his practical experiment he felt and claimed that he had been divinely led. And so the marvelous inventions of the world, including those of telegraphy, have been produced by the brooding of an omniscient God over the human intellect; and as we look upon them as they scatter thoughts and bind societies and organizations in commerce and good will we are prompted to repeat the first message ever sent over a wire: "What hath God wrought?" Nehemiah, in referring to the divine guidance in the success of his marvelous undertaking, said:

For they perceived that this work was wrought of our God. (Neh. 6:16.)

Signor Andrini and His Wonderful Invention

Girl's Deadly Peril

John Anderson and six oil-well shooters were at the Cameron farm in Washington County, Pennsylvania, the other day, and, finding that their explosive had been affected by the cold weather, placed it in two cans of hot water to thaw. Little Mildred Anderson, 11 years old, thinking the cans contained only water, seized them in a spirit of fun and began to run about with them. Circling away from the house she was unnoticed for a few minutes. Then she turned her course toward the group of men, who with blanched faces and horror-stricken hearts realized that Mildred was carrying two quarts of nitroglycerine in each hand and that only the slightest jar or concussion would blow her and all near her into eternity. They were so frightened that they could not speak to the child, and if they could they would have hesitated for fear of the consequences of her fright. Fortunately the father was a man of great presence of mind and said to his little daughter in the mildest voice: "Hello, Mildred, be careful of the water, dear. Come slowly and show daddy how to put down cans without spilling any," he called with a smile and in kindly, even tones. "Oh, I won't spill any, Daddy," the child replied in merry accents. "See how careful I am." With mock gravity little Mildred carefully deposited the cans with their perilous contents on the ground. "See, I didn't spill one little teenty drop," cried the child, clapping her hands, while the oil shooters and her father began at last to breathe more freely. So completely unnerved were the oil men that they refused to shoot the test well that afternoon. Children as well as grown people are unconsciously handling pails that seem to hold only fresh water, but which are full of the most deadly perils, and the greatest watchfulness and caution are necessary to prevent the disastrous moral and spiritual destruction. In passing through the spiritual and material perils of life's journey to the world beyond it is well to pay attention to this injunction of Christ:

Take ye heed, watch and pray: for ye know not when the time is. (Mark 13:33.)

Tolstoy Estate for Sale Here

Yasnaya Polyana, homestead and burial place of Count Leo Tolstoy, is offered for sale in New York by a relative of the Count. The gentleman, Count Kousminsky, who was at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel, New York, explained that he had come to America to confer with Mr. Andrew Carnegie and Mr. John D. Rockefeller, to induce them if possible to purchase the entire estate upon condition that 150 acres, which will include the homestead, the lodge and the burial place of Tolstoy, be set apart for an international park, to be administered by the representatives of all nations. If the plan is carried out, he said, the various nations will be asked to erect permanent memorials. It is the desire of the family that the estate shall not become the property of the Russian Government, which, it is said, hopes to gain possession of the land for the establishment of a national museum. If the estate be acquired by an American, it is said, the Countess Alexandra, Count Tolstoy's daughter, who inherited her father's literary collection, including unpublished novels and dramas, will donate these writings, said to be valued at $5,000,000, to a library to be erected by one of the nations as a memorial to her father. The estate comprises some 750 acres, all of which are offered for sale here with the understanding that 150 acres be set apart for the international Tolstoy park, university and peace memorial. The public does not know yet how Mr. Carnegie or Mr. Rockefeller will respond to the proposition. This project of an international peace memorial would seem timely and beautiful and in harmony with the spirit and life of Count Tolstoy, and with the spirit of the age, and resembling the picture the Psalmist saw:

Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! (Ps. 133:1.)

God Within the Soul

Dr. Orison Swett Marden, in his book, The Miracle of Right Thought, just issued, teaches some splendid lessons. God's blessed presence in the soul is thus described in a paragraph of the preface: "The author tries to show the man who has been groping blindly after a mysterious, misunderstood God, thought to dwell in some far-off realm, that God is right inside of him, nearer to him than hands and feet, closer than his heart-beat or breath, and that he literally lives, moves and has his being in him; that man is mighty or weak, successful or unsuccessful, harmonious or discordant, in proportion to the completeness of this conscious oneness with the Power that made him, heals his wounds and hurts, and sustains him every minute of his existence; that there is but one creative principle running through the universe, one life, one truth, one reality; that this power is divinely beneficent, and that we are a necessary, inseparable part of this great principle-current which is running Godward." Faith will bring this sweet divine presence as a loving personality into our nature to comfort, guide, inspire and save the heart and life. The author must have had this Bible thought in his mind when he wrote the paragraph:

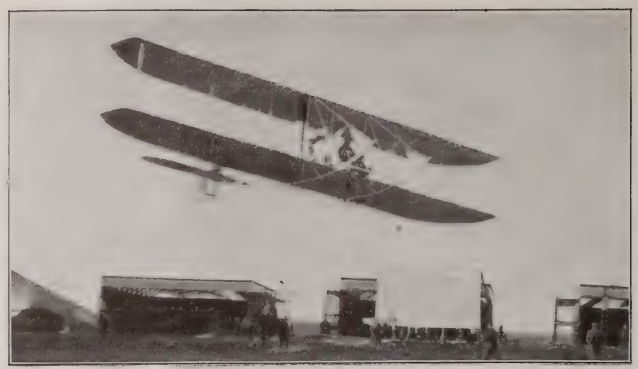
That they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him, though he be not far from every one of us: for in him we live, and move, and have our being. (Acts 17:27, 28.)

Cats Carry Consumption

Dr. W. L. Ensor, of Lakewood, O., charges that cats spread consumption and are a menace to the family. Among the doctor's patients was the head of a family who was affected with tuberculosis. The house cat for a long time had had a heavy cough and the doctor had a suspicion that it had communicated its disease to its master. He advertised for cats at a certain price, a hundred of which he killed and dissected. Under the microscope he found in every one of the animals examined the germs of tuberculosis; 30 per cent. of them were in a serious condition, many of them approaching the last stages of the disease. Others have made the same charge that Dr. Ensor makes, and it would be a prudent thing if parents would take greater care in petting their cats and in protecting the children from the contagion which their affectionate nursing of the kitties is likely to bring to them. Such care of course would almost break the hearts of the little ones, who love their pussies like they do people; but with this, as with all the other relationships and amusements of childhood, the health and life of the child are much more important than its fun. In olden times the greatest precaution was taken to prevent the spread of contagious diseases. Those afflicted with the plague were put off to themselves, and even the garments they wore were carefully inspected, and if found to be infected were destroyed. With diseases of body and soul the prevention is so much more valuable than the cure.

And if it appear still in the garment, either in the warp, or in the woof, or in anything of skin; it is a spreading plague; thou shalt burn that wherein the plague is with fire. (Lev. 13:57.)

Money Turned to Dust



Mr. Joseph Haag, the head gardener on the country estate of Mr. T. L. Chadbourne, Jr., at Purchase, N. Y., had charge of a number of men, tearing down a building more than 100 years old on the estate. After the top of the building had been taken away and the first floor had been reached, and the men began tearing down the old-fashioned chimney, they found tucked away in a secret place a large saddle bag like the ones used in the grandfathers' days. Haag opened the bag and found it filled with paper money, old-fashioned bank-notes, dating back to the War of Independence. Delighted at his fortune he put his hand in the bag to take out the money and it turned to dust at the touch of his fingers. Only the minutest fragments remained. There was one penny dated 1803, perfectly good. The Chadbourne estate adjoins that of Mr. Whitelaw Reed, the American ambassador to the court of St. James, and is not far from the places made famous by General Thomas during the Revolution. It is generally believed that the saddle bag with the money was hidden in the chimney during the war of 1812, when the owner feared a visit from the British. We have here an additional illustration of the folly of hoarding money for money's sake. That bag full of money was idle for a hundred years. If it had been put out at moderate interest, what a colossal fortune it would have been, or if it had been enlisted in intellectual, moral or religious enterprises, of how much value it would have been to the world! But like so many talents that lie dormant through the years, it was useless and perished. The turning of the paper money to dust, corrupted by the rust of a century, suggests the reason of our Lord's exhortation:

Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal. (Matt. 6:19.)

TWO TRAGEDIES OF THE AIR

Arch Hoxsey

Hoxsey in Flight in a Wright Biplane

John B. Moisant

BY A STRANGE tragic coincidence, two of the most brilliant stars in the firmament of aviation sank beneath the horizon of death on the last day of the old year. John B. Moisant was killed at New Orleans and Arch Hoxsey at Los Angeles.

Moisant met his fate by falling from a Bleriot aeroplane while on a preliminary flight which was to have been followed by an attempt to win the Michelin cup and a prize of $4,000 for the longest sustained flight of 1910. He was only a hundred feet in the air when the accident occurred. He had circled the field twice and was coming round on his third lap, when he prepared to descend. He dipped at a sharp angle and when about twenty-five feet from the ground his machine suddenly became vertical; he was pitched forward and shot through the air as if hurled from a catapult. He fell on his head, breaking his neck by the concussion.

Hoxsey dived to his death from a height of 500 feet. When taken from the wreckage of his aeroplane, he was so badly crushed that the field surgeons declared death must have been instantaneous. During the aviation meet, Hoxsey had beaten all records for altitude, rising on three occasions to a height of over 10,000 feet. On the previous Monday, he attained 11,474 feet, the highest point ever reached by a heavier-than-air machine. When he met his death, he was trying to eclipse his own record.

There is no question that Moisant and Hoxsey were the most daring men practising the dangerous art of aerial navigation. Their feats sometimes seemed to verge into utter recklessness; but both loved the thrills and the risks that attended flying, and of course they were not indifferent to the monetary consideration. Both had earned many thousands of dollars in a few months. Moisant had saved about $125,000. Both men had performed many wonderful feats during the aviation week at Hempstead, New York. Moisant won fame by his thrilling and daring flight around the Statue of Liberty and back, a distance of thirty-three miles, in as many minutes. For this he was awarded the Ryan prize of $10,000. More remarkable, however, was his passenger-carrying flight from London to Paris across the English Channel, which drew the attention of the entire world.

Hoxsey was one of the youngest of the American aviators, and had been flying less than a year. He established his fame at Belmont Park as an altitude flyer. He next attracted public attention at the St. Louis meet when he made a long distance record by flying from Springfield to St. Louis, a distance of 109 miles. It was at St. Louis that Hoxsey took up former President Roosevelt for his first air ride. Many think that when Hoxsey plunged to death at Los Angeles, he was overcome with "altitude sickness," which aviators say is much the same as mountain sickness. He descended rapidly from a great height until within 500 feet of the ground, and it is claimed that this swift descent produced either altitude sickness or vertigo, or that it caused contraction of the heart's muscles, rendering Hoxsey unable to manipulate his machine.

Aviation has sustained a severe loss by the tragic death of these two. Their fate will doubtless have the effect of making other "birdmen" more cautious and less prone to take foolish and unnecessary risks in their flights.

to us. The city is now occupied by two mission societies, and is one of the best cities in all China for Christian work.

Our next help was the support of native workers. Some of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD wanted "substitutes" to work for them in China, so money was sent to us for this purpose, and has been coming ever since in greater or less degree. Eternity alone will reveal the great good and the number of people saved through these faithful native workers. We have always kept in touch with the donors and give them quarterly reports about their workers. These Bible-women and evangelists are inspirations and blessings to us missionaries.

Another gift was from a gentleman who read one of our letters in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD about the need of opening up a town near Chao Hsien, called Lin Teo. He wrote saying he had some money in trust, which he hoped would be enough to buy the property needed. This he sent on and we bought a good brick house with out-buildings and a large lot. He then sent a sum to furnish it and repair the walls, and now has taken up the support of Mr. Heo, the native evangelist, paying five dollars monthly. We already have held two baptismal services there; in all twenty-five persons were baptized, and we have now a large class of enquirers. The first man to be baptized there was sixty-eight years old. It was a grand sight to see this old man putting on Christ in baptism. It was indeed a joy to see such a large number gather around the communion table, and remember that only a few months before they were bowing down to wood and stone. All this work was the outcome of that gift that made it possible to open up the town to the Gospel. This Christian has himself received great blessing because of his faithfulness. This kind of work can be duplicated all over our district here in towns yet unoccupied.

Our next gift was for our school-building at Huang-Lo-Ho, another town near Lin Teo. It was only $100 we needed, yet we were able to build a good brick building, 18 x 36 feet. This school has been a great help and blessing to our church there, and we have baptized quite a number of the boys. One is studying in our Bible school at Wuhu and another one will enter this coming year.

We were greatly in need of a building for a girls' school in Wuhu. Our letter was published, and inside of a month the money was sent, and later on a notice was inserted in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD stating that "Missionary Z. C. Beals, of Wuhu, China, with a gift from a CHRISTIAN HERALD reader, now dead, has just completed the Laura B. Memorial School at Wuhu. It is a Christian school for native girls." This school has grown in numbers and has two native teachers besides Miss Cassidy. It is a joy to see the smiling faces of these girls.

When we heard of the death of Dr. Klopsch, we truly mourned our loss. We also wondered if his successors would carry on his policy as to foreign mission work. We are glad to testify that we have seen no difference. Gifts come to us for the work, as before. Last summer, we needed another story added to our academy building. I wrote a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD stating our needs, and $100 was sent in time to complete the building before the fall term. We were thus able to accommodate twelve more students. We could enumerate many good things that have come to us through this grand paper and the good friends that we have come to know through it. We praise God for them and pray that they may be greatly blessed in the days to come.

Wuhu, China. Z. CHARLES BEALS.

ANARCHISTS IN LONDON

ENGLAND is in a ferment of excitement over the discovery of several anarchists' plots which it is believed were to have reached their culmination at the coming coronation of King George in June next. It is said that the "red brotherhood" have a headquarters in the English capital from which they send out their orders to the other European cities, and even to the United States. Four rulers are said to be listed on the book of anarchy for assassination at the coronation ceremony. These are George V., Emperor William, Czar Nicholas and Alfonso of Spain. The plotters had deep laid plans to carry out their nefarious designs and even now, although the scheme has been exposed, the police of London feel they have all they can do to cope with the situation. Two anarchistic desperadoes, resolved to escape capture, barricaded themselves in a house in London, and defied 1,700 police and military for many hours. The house was like a beleagured fortress in wartime. Thousands of shots—bullets, grape and canister—were poured into it, even a gatling gun being called into requisition, but the bandits maintained their stand under the leaden shower, returning in kind, until the house was set on fire. They were at first supposed to have been cremated in the ruins, but this is doubtful. Englishmen are naturally indignant over the idea that such a thing as a battle with alien desperadoes in the heart of London should be possible, and are clamorous for the detection and expulsion of all foreign anarchists from British soil.

BY THE GLOW OF THE FIRELIGHT

Is This Kind or Right?

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE first question that comes up for discussion this week ought to elicit a good many honest replies. What have you to say about this question of advising young people as to married life?

"Why do so many married people tell young girls to either marry to better themselves financially, or else don't venture at all, on the uncertain, dangerous coast of married bliss? B."

The marriage of convenience is foredoomed to failure. A girl lowers herself and a man degrades himself by approaching so solemn and sacred a thing as marriage from a commercial standpoint. Love is the foundation stone of happy marriage. As to replying to the question asked by B., I imagine that the people to whom she alludes are confirmed pessimists, thoughtless counselors or disappointed mariners on the matrimonial sea. Our girls should pay no heed to them. Anybody who wishes to do so is at liberty to speak and may send what she has to say, addressing it personally to me. My name is at the top of this page, and letters should be sent in the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The House-Cleaning Microbe The next communication is a trifle out of season, but as spring is advancing and winter will soon be retreating housecleaning will loom up on the horizon of many matrons. On this theme every one is invited to state her views.

"'A house-cleaning microbe gets into the women at this time of year,' said a man. It is always amusing, sometimes provoking to note how men insist on regarding house-cleaning as a feminine folly. From a man's point of view this silly microbe makes the women uneasy and they set about a lot of useless, foolish work, which makes every one under the roof wretched.

"Now a woman needs no microbe to tell her when the necessary evil of house-cleaning must be faced. No woman of intelligence starts this task for lack of some pleasanter way to use her time! Teach your sons this, and their future wives will bless you some day. While all men enjoy a well ordered home, few have any adequate idea of the careful planning and constant labor it requires to keep household wheels running smoothly. There is no greater test of a housekeeper's efficiency than the way she conducts the regular cleaning. The woman who goes at it with system as complete as it is thorough shows her skill. One room at a time can be cleaned without prolonged inconvenience for any one. Attic, closets and bureau drawers are attended to a little at a time on sweeping days as preliminary work. 'Watch your corners and closets,' said a wise mother; 'any one can keep the rest in order.' A merchant should be the most tolerant of all men in the home, for in running his business, he, too, has experience of the trouble involved in keeping a place for everything and everything in its place. The overzealous woman winds up the house-cleaning with having a sick headache or more serious illness. This sort of climax naturally adds to masculine disgust at the performance. A misguided housekeeper, hearing that some visitors would soon come, decreed that all the house-cleaning must be finished before their arrival. So strenuously did this woman toil, she made herself seriously ill. Instead of welcoming her guests in a spotless house, the visit had to be postponed until she could recover.

"By all means clean house in a rational way. Remember a man wants his wife to be a companion —not a mere drudge. Every homemaker is vastly more important than the house she rules.

"MRS. H. B. A."

MAIDENS FAIR

Busy or idle, these maidens fair
Are caught in the toils of an ancient snare;
Their waking dreams are strangely sweet
As they wait for the ring of their true loves' feet.

A Word to the Tired Mother "In the first place, dear tired mother, I have not been able to get you out of my mind since I read your story in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. If you do not get a rest pretty soon, you may drop into a long rest in the grave, and what then would your husband and children do? You have made a great mistake in not seeing to it that your children were thoroughly taught every branch of housekeeping. Children must go to school, but there are times and seasons for everything. While they are very young, children should be taught that mother's strength is not enough to let her do everything that must be done in the house. She must have little helpers. I know a woman who raised a family of three sons and five daughters, all of whom except two are now married. After they were ten years old each had a share in the work, doing errands, saving the mother steps, and more than this, in the case of the daughters, learning to sew and to mend. The boys were taught to do everything the girls did, and the girls could harness a horse and milk a cow as well as their brothers. They formed one of the most affectionate families I ever saw. S. E. H."

I received not long ago the picture of a beautiful household group from Walla Walla, Wash. Mr. and Mrs. Birney have long been subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. They are a fine looking and handsome couple, and around them stand or sit their sons and daughters, five boys and three girls. A lovelier group of young people I have never seen, and I happen to know that each of Mrs. Birney's boys has mastered the art of assisting in the housework, and each of the girls is well trained in domesticity, as well as in whatever makes a woman socially charming. The dear mother in the group looks like an elder sister. Neither she nor her husband has the slightest air of fatigue. Among my Christmas remembrances nothing gave me more pleasure than this charming photograph. Mrs. Birney is invited to tell our Women in Council how she brought her family up.

An Open Letter to John and Martha "I am very much interested in the affairs of Martha, John and John's mother. I read about them a while back in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In this period of mad rush and woeful lack of filial affection the problem of the old mother and the married children is hard to solve. Martha is probably up-to-date, John's mother, a plain woman of the old-fashioned type. I am a mother past three-score and ten, and I want to sit down and show you a simple page from real life. I have a son George with whom I have always taken lots of comfort. He chose a good home daughter when he married, the kind who is apt to make the best of wives. We have been happy since his marriage, and though we are hard-working people, we enjoy our home and the three harum-scarum children who make things lively. I highly prize the good-night kiss all around. Old folks are often in the way, troublesome and disagreeable. Well, let me see. Seems to me that I remember a number of little cherubs who a few years ago were around cutting up didoes and causing their tired mothers care and hard work, day and night, in sickness or health. Some of these children when grown, forget the past and haven't much use for the old mother. What a pity! I have no complaint on this score. I have my own room, the best in the house, do my own everyday work when able, and Lucy, my son's wife, kindly does the heavier work for me, and is very thoughtful for my comfort. She works very hard for us all, as does her husband. Lucy and I are careful to avoid occasions of offense, as neither of us is an angel. We love George too well to place him between the blades of a great pair of shears. Now, John, I beg you to love and honor both wife and mother, and Martha, let me ask you to be loving and gentle with the mother who gave you the best she had when she gave you her son. As for you, mother, bear in mind that the present generation is more advanced and refined than ours was. Do not criticise Martha, and never volunteer advice to her. Don't find fault, but as far as you can, add to the good cheer of the home.

Chicago's Sunday Club

THOUSANDS of parents living in other cities and in farming communities have sons or daughters living in Chicago. Many brothers and sisters, nieces, nephews, or close friends have left the little town or the farm to seek their fortunes in the big city. These people who go to live in Chicago as strangers often find it difficult to get acquainted with the right class of people. The writer of this knows how hard it is, for he has had the experience.

Many young men and women, strangers in Chicago, live in or near the central business section known as the Loop District. Business has crowded out nearly all the churches in the district, and newcomers and the older residents do not find it as convenient now to go to church. Realizing the need in Chicago's downtown district of an institution that stood for the moral welfare of its inhabitants, the leading business men of Chicago formed what is called "The Sunday Evening Club," a nonsectarian organization, which holds meetings every Sunday evening from seven o'clock till ten o'clock in Orchestra Hall, Michigan Avenue, near Jackson Boulevard.

The hall seats about 2,500 people, and is filled almost to overflowing every Sunday evening. All religious denominations are interested in its work, as its principles are broad, morally inspirational, and conducive to good citizenship. The Sunday Evening Club's influence particularly aims to reach the man or woman who does not belong to any creed or any church, but who still has a longing for the inspiration that he may get in full measure from the good old Bible teachings. Young men and women who work hard all week and who do not care to spend money for the frivolous pleasures of the theatre find in the Sunday Evening Club's meetings the moral and religious inspiration which the human mind and heart crave. Many people work late Saturday night and part of Sunday morning and cannot go to Sunday morning services if they desired, and as few churches have Sunday evening services the Sunday Evening Club offers them the opportunity of spending the evening in a profitable manner.

A general invitation to the farm population of the country to attend the meetings of the Sunday Evening Club, when in Chicago, has just been extended by Chicago business men who are behind that organization.

Such speakers as Gifford Pinchot, William Jennings Bryan, Jacob Riis, ex-Governor Hoch of Kansas, Governor Marshall of Indiana, ex-Governor Hanley, and David Starr Jordan, president of Leland Stanford University, are scheduled to speak at various times during the winter months. There is a chorus of fifty voices, a double quartette and vocal soloists.

These addresses and the Gospel services form a welcome opportunity to spend an interesting and instructive evening among pleasant people listening to great truths that make for the uplift and betterment of the human family.

Millions in an Automobile

The Printing Bureau in Washington has just ordered a large automobile in which it intends to transport about $15,000,000 a day from the Bureau to the Treasury Department. Two guards and the driver will occupy the front seat and three guards will be seated over the tailboard.

The Thing That Counts

IT IS not what you say, my brother,
As you travel the earthly row,
That maketh the cause of the Master
With sweetness and beauty to glow;
But it's what you may do, my brother,
And what you may be in your life
That wins in the cause of the Master
As He leadeth you forth to the strife!

You see that old engine there standing
Stock still on its iron rail—
How the columns of smoke roll upward
Most to Heaven an inky trail?
But when its great wheels are in motion,
And its breathing comes quick and fast,
You could hardly tell it was pouring
E'en a portion of smoke on the blast!

And so it may be, O my brother,
As you travel or north or south,
The cause of the Lord may be hampered
If you smoke too much at the mouth;
But let the power of your being
Be thrown to the feet and the hands:
Let us leap to the work of the vineyard,
Let us do as our Lord commands!

You love well to talk; yes, my brother;
But take care in talking too free,
When the world shall stop in its labor,
To notice a moment your plea.
It may fail to hear one slight sentence
In all the fine message you give
From hearing the noise and the clatter
Of the miserable life you live!

Sweet, sweet is the word, O my brother,
Of a soul that is born of truth;
But no man can testify farther
Than the life he lives in sooth;
You may talk in the grandest of poems
That can fall from the lips of man,
But they're awfully out of proportion
Unless your life's actions will scan!

Thou Shalt Know

MY SAVIOUR speaks to me to-day:
"Come, pilgrim, take my guiding hand;
Thou knowest but in part my way;
Hereafter, thou shalt understand."

Tho' trials come in varied form,
Afflictions fierce and cunning foes,
I'll calmly view the rising storm
And rest in this: My Saviour knows.

He knows their strength and guileful art,
He knows my trouble and my pain;
What thorn has pierc'd my aching heart;
Yet why should these so long remain?

He sees, He knows, He speaks to me:
"Thou yet art slow to understand—
Submissive and obedient be;
Hold thou thy elder Brother's hand.

"Sufficient thou that find my grace,
My strength in weakness shall be thine,
Thou shalt ere long behold my face,
And in my perfect likeness shine."

Lord, what are light afflictions here,
Since I can hold Thy loving hand,
Soon safe at home with Thee appear,
And all Thy dealings understand?

Germantown, Pa. J. M. LYONS.

A Child's Morning Prayer

THIS morn, when I get up from sleep,
I give my soul to Christ to keep;
Oh guard me safely through this day
And keep me in the narrow way.
If I should die while yet 'tis light,
Before the darkness comes this night,
I pray the Lord my soul to take,
And this I ask for Jesus' sake. AMEN.

Robert Sterling Blair

ROBERT STERLING BLAIR, a young member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD editorial staff, died at his home in Brooklyn on Sunday morning, January 1, after a very brief illness. Mr. Blair, who was the only son of Mr. Albert L. Blair and Mary M. Blair, was a young man of great promise. Trained at Harvard University, he began his literary career on a Boston publication and afterward became attached to this journal, to which he has rendered faithful service for nearly five years. His fine Christian character, high sense of honor, and the natural courtesy and kindness he showed at all times, won him the esteem and affection of his associates.

Mr. Blair was personally interested in philanthropic work, and was secretary of the Bowery Mission. At the funeral services, which took place on Wednesday, January 4, there was present a delegation from the Mission, in addition to a large number of friends and professional associates of the deceased. After the reading of Scripture by the officiating pastor, Rev. John Hallimond, Superintendent of the Mission, delivered a very touching address, which was full of consolation for the bereaved family. He closed with a tribute to the fine Christian character and blameless life of the young man, whose earthly career had been so brief. The interment took place in the family plot at Madison, Central New York.

Emperor William's Apples

CAN the results of orchardists in the Far West be achieved in the East and Far Northeast? What is there in the West that is not found in the East?

The cloudless skies, which put the fine color on the apple; the dryness of the climate, which is death to fungous diseases; the volcanic soil, which brings the apple tree to bearing at the age of five years, may not be duplicated outside of a favored region; but they are offset by peculiar advantages. Among these are longevity of the tree, flavor of the fruit, and unlimited markets next door. Whether the quick-growing trees of the West will ever bear seventy-five years or longer, as they are known to do in the East, remains to be seen. Professor W. N. Hutt, of Raleigh, N. C., would verify the statement of apple-trees bearing so long.

Of course, the flavor of the fruit is a matter of taste. But why did a representative of the German Empire last year select for the table of his imperial master, apples grown within sixty miles of Omaha in sight of the Missouri River? Why did the plate exhibit of the "Jonathan apple"—a great favorite of the fancy trade—from Harrison County, Iowa, take the first award against so many splendid specimens from regions better known? Why were fine apples from the vicinity of Portland, Me., worthy of consideration in the National Fruit Exhibit? Why did pears from Maryland carry off first prize competing with Western exhibits?

It all shows that the older West and the still older East need not strike colors before the younger and more lusty Far West, albeit the fancy of the nation has been captivated by its fruit-growing possibilities, which are constantly kept before the public gaze. What is better, both sections may go on for a long time to come before overproduction in fruit should make them envious rivals.

LITTLE MUKÉ, THE CHILD-WIDOW

A Typical Village Kitchen of India

The Childhood Home of Little Muké

MUKÉ was born in a little Indian village called Babagadia. She was the first child, and no little disappointment was experienced by her parents when it was known that their first born was only a girl. Her mother shed many bitter tears over her misfortune and yet her heart went out true mother fashion to her little girl. Gradually the father became reconciled and finally loved his baby daughter.

When Muké was a few days old, the village astrologer was called and, after consulting his almanacs as to the relative position of the planets, wrote out in strange characters—which no one but the men of his profession could read—the story of Muké's life. On the day when Muké was six months old, the neighbors were all called in and given a feast of curry and rice with sweetened curd. When she became old enough to understand something of her surroundings, she became aware that the house she lived in was made of mud with a roof of bamboos and rice straw. A room at one end was used as a stable for the cows and goats, while the middle room served as kitchen. The kitchen was furnished with two stones between which the rice was ground for flour and the pulse broken for porridge. In one corner was a hollowed-out place in the ground, where was a camp-fire on which the cooking was done. A few brass dishes and some earthen pots completed the furnishings. The only picture was one of the elephant-headed god, Gonash. A little brass god reposed in one corner and was supposed to ward off cholera and other evils from the household.

Muké, a Heathen Child Widow

There was a little school in the village. The pupils met on the veranda of one of the houses. Muké sometimes watched the boys at work over their books and wondered what it all meant, but was told that, being only a girl, she could not learn to read, and that women had no need of that sort of thing.

Up to this time Muké had worn nothing but her birthday clothes. Imagine her delight when one day her father returned from the market with about two yards of white cotton cloth, with a red margin, for a dress for her. There was no tedious wait while mother cut and fitted the dress. In less than a minute she had draped it as a saree around the child's body, according to the custom of Indian women.

When the long, dry, hot season was past and the rains began she went into the fields with her father to help transplant the rice. On one of these days, the first great tragedy of her life occurred. As she was returning with her father in the evening, she saw him leap into the air and scream with fear and pain, for a deadly cobra had been lying in the path and had bitten him on the foot. A medicine man was called, and breaking a branch from the sacred tulsy plant, he waved it back and forth over his foot to charm away the poison. Muké saw the excitement of the neighbors, and the look of pain and terror on her father's face. In less than half an hour her father was dead. Before midnight, the neighbors had prepared a frame-work of bamboos, and wrapping her father in a white cloth they bore him out into the field and placing his body upon a pile of wood, set fire to it. When she awoke next morning, she saw that already her mother's head had been shaven, all her ornaments taken off and her body wrapped in a "widow's cloth."

Muké by and by got to be a big girl. To allow her to pass her tenth birthday without being married, her mother believed, would incur the displeasure of the gods, so her mother got together all the money she could and started out to find a husband for Muké. Day after day her search proved vain. True, she found two or three who were willing to take little Muké as a daughter-in-law; but when their horoscopes were examined it was found that they had been born in a different phase of the planets than Muké, and so the marriage could not lawfully take place. Unknown to Muké's mother, a man in a village about four miles distant had bribed the priests to make an unfavorable report of Muké's horoscope, his object being to compel her to give her daughter to his son, for whom he had been unable to secure a wife. She gave her daughter to this man, who was nearly twenty years older than Muké, who was about to reach her tenth birthday. When the wedding day arrived, she was dressed in a fine yellow cloth, her entire body having been anointed with turmeric to give her a rich complexion. She was then brought into the room, where for the first time she saw her husband, who, according to Indian custom, presented her with a bottle of perfume, a looking glass, a comb and a few yards of silk cloth. In turn, Muké's mother paid over to the groom the dowry of her daughter, which she had gotten together only after selling her last pair of bullocks and mortgaging all her household furnishings. This accomplished, a feast was spread for all the guests; after which Muké was placed in a palky and carried on the shoulders of four men. Bidding her mother good-by, she started with the procession for her husband's home. On her arrival an iron bracelet was placed upon her wrist as a symbol of her bondage. Being married, she is no longer allowed to meet or speak with boys or men other than her immediate relatives. Being of a low caste, she may go out of doors, but only with her face entirely covered with her cloth. After one month spent in the home of her husband, she is allowed to pay a visit to her mother. Day after day she listens to the laughter and shouts of her former playmates, but all association with them is forbidden her. She may see her girl friends, but only behind closed doors.

Returning to her husband, her seclusion becomes still more strict. Never is she allowed to step out of doors except in company with an old woman, and with her face closely veiled. Indoors she is compelled to drudge for the entire family. In the presence of her husband, his father or older brothers, she is never allowed to speak to a third party.

Two dreary years come and go. One day Muké's husband falls in a fit and expires. At the age of thirteen she joins India's procession of depressed and despairing child-widows. India has twenty-seven million widows, more than seven million of them under ten years of age. The religion of India teaches that a husband dies because his wife has displeased the gods, and the people seek the favor of the gods by punishing her in ample measure. Muké's head is shaven, her few ornaments stripped off and she is clad in "widow's cloth." She is no longer compelled to keep her face veiled and she is put to work in the fields. She is allowed one meal a day which is taken at night after other members of the household have dined. One day each week she must go without any food. She is frequently beaten, as the many scars upon her back and limbs testify. Life had become intolerable. Many times she decided to drown herself in the village tank. Sixty thousand of India's widows commit suicide every year. One night, she awakened with a resolve to run away and go to her mother. On the way she was met by a man who lived in the same village with her mother. He persuaded Muké, with many fair promises, to come to his house. The next day two Kubulas (men of Northern India) came to the house. That night she overheard them planning to carry her away and sell her into a life of sin and slavery. She slipped out into the darkness and made her way to her mother's house.

Her pursuers were not long in discovering her whereabouts. They demanded of the mother that she put her daughter out of doors. When she refused, they accused Muké of having stolen money, and threatened her with the police. They notified the Brahman priests, who ordered the mother to send her away, else she herself would be outcasted and driven out of the village. The mother realized that to refuse was useless. She proposed a compromise. If they would allow her daughter to remain with her until the morrow, she would then send her away without further objection. Soon after midnight, Muké and her mother, removing some slats from a back window, crawled out and, under protection of some bushes, escaped across the fields to the little Christian village of Kalia Matia. At the door of Seba Pator, pastor of the village church, they told their story, and begged for protection. He fully realized the danger, but it was finally arranged that Muké should live with the Christians. In the morning the mother declared her daughter had run away in the night. Two days later, the Christians of Kalia Matia had gathered on the veranda of Seba Pator's house for the morning prayer-meeting. Muké had told them her story and expressed her desire to learn about the Christian religion. The pastor had taught her to pray, and she had knelt with them and thanked God for her escape and for kind Christian friends. Suddenly the voice of thanksgiving was drowned by the shouts and turmoil of a mob, led by the men who were Muké's persecutors. At sight of them Muké fled within the house. The pastor stoutly refused to put her out of doors. They threatened to beat him and to burn his house, but he still held out. At last they beat down his door and dragged Muké out by the hair of her head and,

The Prince and the Goose Girl—The New Fairy Tale

ONCE upon a time, in an enchanted valley, among the Lonely Hills of the Black Forest, there lived a wicked Witch, who with magic evil spells guarded a Goose Girl, as beautiful as the Sleeping Beauty in the rose-tangled wood, as high-hearted and royal as a fairy queen. She really was a royal princess with a princess' heart, but the spell of the Witch kept her a poor Goose Girl, and only the geese that knew her gentle ways, the flowers that she all day long wove into wreaths and fancies, and the old Linden, where she danced and sang her little songs along with the birds, when the Witch had gone over the hills to Hellabrunn, might ever have told you of the loneliness in the little Goose Girl's heart.

In spite of her loneliness, however, sometimes she was wonderfully happy, as you shall see.

On the midsummer morning when this story begins, she was happy; happy as the blue and red birds lilting in and out of the vines and branches like waving ribbons, and singing through the Enchanted Valley as though they would burst with joy. The Witch had gone to Hellabrunn. The radiant beauty of the morning stole into the Goose Girl's heart. She called the birds and danced, then she decked herself with flowers, and putting a tiny wreath on her golden hair, she courtesied and nodded to her sweet image in the pool where the astonished geese gobbled and stretched their curious necks in dull wonder at so blithe a sight.

"Often she was wonderfully happy"

Come crowd about me,
My goosies and ganders!
Sing, tiny valley-birds!
Crumbs for you all I bring.
Speak, little flowers, to me:
Crown me and love me;
Sweet fairy fountain,
Ripple and sing
Fair as a dream
Is the Goose Girl queen!

she sang, and, bathed in the mist of the early day, she was lovely as a Dream-Fairy's dream.

The Prince Comes By

Now, on this same midsummer morning a Prince of the royal house of Hellabrunn, who had long since left the court because he despised the servile, brow-beaten ways of his father's subjects, happened into the Enchanted Valley, and came upon the Goose Girl singing and dancing.

"I bid you good-day," he called, "my pretty queen of Ganderland." Then in his bravest voice, catching up the key-note of her song, he sang to her:

Wilt thou go a-Maying,
A-Maying, love, with me?
So true and tender
With thee will I be;
Fairest, rarest maid,
No spell shall hold thee,
Fast will I shield thee,
All else will perish,
Thee alone will I cherish,
And my kingdom shall love
The Goose Girl Queen.

A Princess to the very tips of her glistening golden hair, she bade the strange Prince welcome. They sang their little songs together, exchanged wonder-tales, and wove pretty blossoms into crowns for each other. Under the magic spell of love, they even planned that when the King of Hellabrunn should at last be dead, they, the people's chosen King and Queen, would rule over that old spell-haunted kingdom, with tenderness and love.

Alack! the Wicked Witch!

Ah, what a splendid dream it was! Only little children who love fairy tales and those "olders" who have lived in enchanted valleys, can guess how happy the Prince and Goose Girl were that long sweet day together.

Alack! they had reckoned without the Witch; for, when the sun was setting in the golden West, and hand in hand they came to the edge of the forest, thinking to escape together, tangled grasses held the Goose Girl fast, thorny bushes and brambles lashed her face and arms, until, torn and bleeding, she fled in terror back to the Witch's hut.

The Prince, fearing in her fury the Witch would kill him, or put him under some evil spell, and then the Goose Girl would perhaps never be rescued, threw his golden crown after her in token of his faith and love, and fared away over the spell-bound mountains alone.

The rest of the story is very sad, so we shall hurry over it quickly, and I promise next time to tell you a merrier tale.

The wonderful love that blossomed in the Goose Girl's heart on that midsummer day soonbroke the Witch's spell. So, trailing along with her geese, she left the Valley to find her Prince.

The Children's Chosen King and Queen

The splendid dream of bringing happiness into the lives of the dull people of the kingdom of Hellabrunn never came true.

"A King without a crown! A Queen that is only a gander maid! To rule over us!" the dullards cried. "Kings and Queens in glittering robes come riding on golden chariots in pomp and splendor! No! No!" they shouted; "we will have none of you!" Then they jostled and stoned out of the town the Goose Girl who was really a Princess, and the Prince who was heir to their kingdom.

It may seem very strange to you that the little children of Hellabrunn guessed the truth about the Goose Girl and the Prince, and when the winter set in with the ice and snow, they made a little crusade over the Lonely Hills into the valley to find them, and urge them to come back and live among them. But they came too late.

There beneath the Linden tree they lay, fast asleep in each other's arms—the Prince and his Goose Girl bride. The snow was falling very thick and fast, the little white snow birds had only just grown unafraid, and to the children they seemed to be carefully covering them with leaves.

If you should pass that way, there on the boll of the Linden tree you will find, in letters that little German children might have carved, the word Koenigskinder, and some Black Forest minstrel, they tell me, beneath that inscription has written,

"THE CHILDREN'S CHOSEN KING AND QUEEN."

Cozy Corners Full of Good Things

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS: I feel sure that you will like the new German fairy tale, "The Prince and the Goose Girl." The real name of it is Koenigskinder, which might have been translated "Kingly Children," but I like it with the name we have given it even better, don't you?

It is rarely enough one has a new fairy tale to tell. I only wish you might all have been along with me the other day to hear little Edith Humperdinck tell the whole of it (there is only a part of the story here) in her quaint, pretty English.

"Oh, Miss Porter," she said, "I love to say it to you; you listen just like a little girl." This made me very happy, you may be sure.

Edith's father, Herr Engelbert Humperdinck, has written beautiful music for the Koenigskinder, and she came all the way from her home at Boppard on the Rhine to hear the story told, with her father's music, to thousands of little American children, who were invited to listen to it in New York on Christmas afternoon.

Be on the lookout for the next Cozy Corner. It will be full of good things, and the Special February Prize Contest will start in it. Be sure to send the very best work you can do to these Special Prize Contests. We are going to make a point of publishing some of your own stories, verses, poems and pictures nearly every week in the Cozy Corner, and once a month, remember, you are to have a page entirely of your own work.

Every boy and girl is made welcome in the Cozy Corner.

Our Good-Night Verse Is:

"Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated wickedness, therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness."

Lovingly and faithfully,

The Aunt in the Cozy Corner,

Janet Porter

TO THE HIGHEST BIDDER

Serial Story by FLORENCE MORSE KINGSLEY

Synopsis of Previous Chapters

Little Jimmy Preston, aged six, gets a letter at the post office for his sister Barbara. On the way home it is lost. Barbara has been trying to keep the farm, the last of her father's estate, for Jimmy, but it is mortgaged to Stephen Jarvis, who threatens to foreclose. Barbara goes to Mr. Jarvis to ask for more time on the mortgage. He tells her that he is disposed to do it, and also that he is tired of his present housekeeper and would like her to fill the place. She leaves without a word. The old housekeeper at once becomes her enemy. Stephen Jarvis comes to see Barbara. He asks her to marry him and he will give her the farm. She refuses. She thinks of her old lover, David Whitcomb, who is reported dead. Peleg Morrison (Peg for short), the old farm hand, finds the letter. All she can make out is the post-mark and signature, which is that of David Whitcomb. Barbara writes to the address, Tombstone, Ariz., but the letter is returned "not called for." She makes a desperate resolution. Going to Mr. Bellows, the auctioneer, she tells him that she wishes to sell her skill and intelligence for a term of years "to the highest bidder." Against his will, he consents to auction her off. Jarvis is astonished when he finds Barbara is to sell her services, and comes to protest. Whitcomb returns while the auction is in progress. A man giving the name of Smith secures her services for $4,000. Whitcomb in anger demands who the bidder is, but cannot find out. Bellows says Barbara is to stay at the farm until called for, but will not tell the name of the buyer for whom Smith acted. She hires Martha Cottle to come and keep house while she is away. She pays Jarvis his money. Whitcomb comes to se her. She finds him changed. He urges her to marry him, but she tells him she must keep to the contract. Months pass, still Barbara is kept in suspense. Martha Cottle tells Peg Morrison Barbara is engaged to Whitcomb. She has "heard 'em spooning." Whitcomb dines at the Barford Eagle Hotel, where he is served by a waitress named Jennie. He vainly tries to bribe the auctioneer to tell him who has bought Barbara's services. Jarvis also refuses information, and that evening calls on Barbara and asks her not to marry Whitcomb; begs her forgiveness for his treatment of her, and says that he thinks of going away, adding, "I want to carry with me the certainty that you will sometimes think kindly of me. Not that I deserve it, but——"

XVII—Continued

HIS eyes dark with pain searched her face.

"I cannot bear to remember all that has passed between us. I know now that I was less than a man to threaten you—browbeat you, as I did. I hope you will believe me when I tell you I am hoping for your best—your truest and most lasting happiness."

His voice shaken with the solemn passion of renunciation died into silence.

She put her hand into his.

"I—am sorry," she faltered.

"For what, Barbara?" he asked.

She drew a deep sigh that was half a sob.

"For—everything," she said. Her mouth quivered like a grieving child's.

"And you do forgive me, Barbara?"

"Yes."

He raised her fingers to his lips.

"Good-by," he said.

She heard his rapid step on the gravel without, and later the whirr of wheels, faint and fainter in the distance.

Barbara did not tell David all that had passed between Jarvis and herself, when on the following day he unburdened himself of the multiplied conjectures and complaints which had occurred to him since his briefly renewed acquaintance with the lawyer.

"I suspected the old fox knew more than he owned up to me, though when I taxed him with it he was ready to lie out of it," David said. He drew Barbara to him and kissed her carelessly full on the mouth.

"I'll wager you've been wondering why I didn't bring you a ring," he went on exuberantly. "Girls always like rings, and I see you don't wear anything but that plain one. Here, I'll——"

"Don't take it off," implored Barbara. "It was my mother's. It was her wedding ring."

"That's all right, dear. But you must take it off, just the same. I'll give you all the rings you'll need to wear from now on."

He snapped open a tiny case of white velvet and flashed its imbedded jewel in her averted eyes.

"Do you like it, dear? Do you think it's pretty? I couldn't get anything decent in this hole, of course, so I sent to the city for it. It just came by express last night. I found it when I got back from my delightful ride with that old crab, Jarvis."

"It—it's beautiful, David, but——"

"I hope it'll fit; let me put it on, dearest."

"David—I—can't; don't you see—I am not free to—to——"

"What in heaven's name are you talking about? Aren't we engaged?"

"I—don't know," the girl said slowly. "No—not till fall. You mustn't——"

"Confound old Jarvis, if he's been putting any such notions into your head!" cried David. "Why, Barbara, you're talking nonsense. I'll buy the fellow off. I told Jarvis I would."

"You told him?"

"Why, of course I did. And I mean to. We'll be married by that time. Now, don't say no. Once we're married hard and fast there'll be no back talking coming from Jarvis or anybody else. Come, sweetheart, let me put this ring on your dear little finger, and next month I'll add another of a different sort. Then I'll be in a position to talk business with old Jarvis, or his client, whoever he is. I'll say, 'Here's your money, sir,' short and sharp; 'take it or leave it, as suits you best. My wife doesn't go out to service with any man.'—That's my sensible girl!"

He would have drawn her into his arms. But she resisted him tensely.

"You don't understand, David, and you must understand," she said slowly. "I—promised I wouldn't—till——"

"You promised! Who in the world did you promise? You promised me, and I'm going to hold you to it."

"No; not till after I was bound, and I—only promised you conditionally. Don't you remember, David?"

"I only remember what I choose to remember," he said superciliously. "And all I know, or care to know, at the present moment, is that you're mine—mine, Barbara! Haven't I waited for years and suffered—Barbara!"

His voice vibrated with passion; he reached out for her hungrily, irresistibly, and held her fast in the clasp of one powerful arm, while with the other he sought for her elusive hand.

"One finger is just as good as another for me," he laughed as he slipped the ring into place. "There! Isn't that handsome?"

But she hid her troubled eyes against his shoulder.

"Not on my ugly brown hand, David," she murmured. "And I cannot wear it—yet. I promised."

"That's twice you mentioned the fact that you promised," he said scowling. "Did Jarvis have the brazen nerve to come between you and me with any of his cut and dried legal business?"

"He—reminded me of my contract. He said——"

"Well; I'll fix that up with Jarvis. Say, do you know, he makes me tired? I told him we were engaged, and if he had any such line of talk to pass out he might have come to me. I'm the one for him to do business with from now on, and I'll let him know it, too."

He released her suddenly.

"You can do as you like about the ing," he said in an offended tone. Most girls would jump at the chance o wear a two-hundred-dollar diamond. 'll chuck it into the wastebasket, if you ay so."

"O David!" breathed Barbara, "did ou spend all that money—just for ie?"

"Yes, I did; and I supposed you'd be leased. I never dreamed you'd refuse o wear it."

"But—it isn't that I don't love you," he faltered. "Indeed I——"

"Well, if you love me, you'll do as I ay," interrupted David, with an arrotant toss of his handsome head. "Will ou, Barbara?"

"I will in everything but—you know, lear. I—I can't."

He stared at her in angry silence.

"You appear a soft enough little hing," he said at last, "but you're as bstinate as—here, give me the ring. 'll not force it on you."

She slipped it from her finger in ilence, and he took it, restored it to its elvet nest and dropped the case in his ocket.

"The next time I ask you to wear hat ring," he said, "you'll either do it, r——"

"David!" cried Barbara faintly. Please—please don't be angry. Try o—understand."

"Try to understand—eh? Well, I'm ot so dull as some; but you've got me tumped all right. Maybe that's what ou're trying to do."

She put out her hands to him pleadngly. But he did not choose to see hem.

"I'll talk with Jarvis," he said oughly. "And in the meantime you keep away from him. Just let me nanage for a while. A woman isn't ip to business, anyway. Why, it makes ne hot to think of his coming here and alking you to a finish the way he did. wish I'd caught him at it, that's all."

"David!" Barbara's voice was low nd urgent. "I wish you wouldn't——"

"Wouldn't what?"

She clung to his arm; but his look lid not soften.

"Please don't—say anything to Mr. Jarvis. He—means to be kind. He——"

David turned suddenly and caught her by the shoulders.

"See here," he said. "I'm beginning o see a glimmer of light through this particular millstone. Is Jarvis the man who tried to get you to marry him while I was away? Answer me!"

"He asked—me—to marry him, and I——"

David burst into a great laugh.

"Well, well!" he cried, "that was a conquest. Old Jarvis, of all men! Why, Barb, you're a wonder. Ha ha!"

She trembled before his loud laughter, as she had not beneath the weight of his displeasure.

David suddenly became grave, his brows drawn in thought.

"That puts a different face on things," he said.

XVIII

It was at Hewett's grocery and general store, as might have been expected, that the singular event of the auction at the Preston farm had been discussed in all its various aspects. The amount of the mortgage held by Stephen Jarvis, the various expedients resorted to by the daughter of Donald Preston, and the events leading up to her desperate and successful coup had all been reviewed circumstantially and in order. The continued presence of David Whitcomb in the community furnished a welcome variation to the subject; and inasmuch as David was found not averse to talking of himself, there was little mystery about his return to Barford and its object.

"Thinks he's too good to walk now 't he's got them shiny pointed shoes," observed Hank Smith, whose footgear was of the square-toed variety, presumably inherited from a deceased relative. "I see him drivin' a rig out t' Preston's to-day."

"Yas," corroborated the local liveryman. "He's took it b' the week. Says he's thinkin' of buyin' a good horse."

"Huh! you don't say!" drawled a farmer from the hills, who had dropped in for his week's supply of groceries and his mail. "I s'pose he done pretty well out West. Mebbe I c'd sell him that bay mare o' mine."

"He spen's lots o' money; I don' know how much he's got," was the unchallenged opinion put forth by another.

There followed a general oscillation of heads about the empty stove, a round-bellied affair, capable of fierce white heats in the winter time, but abandoned to rust in summer and habitually diffusing a clammy scent of chimney soot and damp ashes.

"I guess the' don't anybody know 's t' thet; I heard him speak o' minin' prop'ties kind o' careless like. He sure does carry a big wad."

"Wall, I'll give that young feller about four months t' run through what he's got," the elder Hewett observed in the intervals of passing various purchases of coffee through his grinder. "I'll bet I c'd carry all the minin' prop'ty he owns in m' vest pocket, an' hev room fer m' han'kerchief."

"'Twon't take him that long if he keeps on as he's goin' now. I heerd"—the speaker leaned forward, bringing the legs of his chair to the floor with an impressive thump—"'at he's pretty fast; drinks consid'ble an' plays cards fer money. Wonder if she knows?"

"Barb'ry ought t' look out, if he's that kind," observed another, wagging his pendulous chin whiskers. "Her pa'd ought t' be a serious warnin' t' her."

"Shaw! 'tain't so," put in a third. "Dave's all right. He ain't so slow 's to be actually mossy; but he's all right. I'll bet you——"

What the speaker was about to wager on his charitable opinion was lost to the public, as Peg Morrison stubbed noisily up the steps, and entered the door swung hospitably wide to dust, flies and the traveling public.

"Hello, Peg; how's your folks?" drawled Al Hewett, presenting his round, solemn face at the square aperture devoted to the delivery of mail. "Le' me see; here's a paper fer you, an' a circ'lar—one o' them phosphate ads you've been gettin' lately. An' a letter fer Miss Barb'ra. Do you want I should forward it—eh?"

"Forward it—no; give it t' me."

Mr. Morrison's voice held an exasperated note discouraging to those in quest of information.

"Then she ain't left yet?" queried an individual, comfortably seated over the cool recesses of the pickle barrel. "Somebody was sayin'——"

"No, sir," said Peg, facing about and addressing the inquiring circle of eyes as one man. "No, sir; Miss Barb'ry ain't gone, an' as fer 's I know, she'll be home, anyhow, till after the apples is picked."

"Goin' t' gether a pretty fair crop this year, I see," observed the village veterinary, who combined the business of livery and sale stable with his more learned profession.

"You bet," chuckled Peg. "W'y, them apples'll beat anythin' in the country. We're goin' t' exhibit at th' fair, same 's we ust to."

"Apples is goin' t' be so cheap y' can't git nothin' fer 'em," said a farmer pessimistically, "ef they don't all drop off the trees come September, it's b'en s' dry."

"Our apples won't drop, I'll bet you," bragged Peg. "We've kep' th' ground in our orchards plowed an' cultivated all summer. Miss Barb'ry, she kind o' got that notion las' spring, f'om readin' some gov'ment report, an' jus' to humor her I done 's she said."

"'Tain't no way to do," put in another. "The grass prevents th' roots from heavin'; keeps 'em cool in summer an' warm in winter. Y' don't ketch me payin' any 'tention to them blamed gov'ment reports."

No one being immediately minded to disprove this sweeping statement there was brief silence for a space. Then a new topic was introduced.

"Say, Peleg, when's the weddin' comin' off to your place?"

"The weddin'? What weddin'?" parried Peg cautiously. "I ain't heard o' no weddin'."

"You hain't—heh? Well, you're kind o' behind the times."

"I heerd the' was to be two weddin's out your way come fall," cackled the horse doctor. "How 'bout Marthy an' th' onions?"

Peg turned an angrily bewildered face upon the speaker.

"Th' onions," he said, "is O. K.; but I dunno what you're drivin' at."

"Well, I'll tell you; Marthy Cottle told Elviry Scott, an' she tol' my wife's sister, that you was payin' her marked attention. She said she hadn't made up her mind whether t' marry ye or not. But she thought mebbe she might, ef th' onion crop turned out all right. I sez t' m' wife——"

A roar of laughter drowned the balance of the sentence and Peg's indignant denial.

"I ain't done no more," he averred, "than t' wipe m' feet careful on th' door-mat on the kitchen stoop when th's mud on the ground'. An' I only done that t' keep th' peace."

"Well, Peleg, ef you c'n make out t' keep th' peace with Marthy Cottle I reckon you're the man fer Marthy," was the opinion of the senior Hewett, delivered over the top of a tall bag of sugar which he was weighing.

Mr. Morrison looked troubled.

"I guess I'll be goin' 'long," he said, and cast a defiant look around the circle. "Ef I was you," he said, "I'd keep m' mouth shet 'bout things I didn't know anythin' 'bout."

No one answered; but there was a general laugh as his heavy boots were heard to strike the sidewalk.

"Poor old Peleg," said one, "them Prestons has kep' him pretty busy cookin' up excuses. An' ef she marries Whitcomb I guess Peleg'll be up against it a while longer."

"'Twon't be any time b'fore Jarvis gits another mortgage; mebbe he'll fetch it this time. 'Tain't often the 'oner'ble gent gits left. I hed t' laugh when I heerd she's paid him off."

In the thoughtful silence that followed this expression of opinion a small spare individual, wearing a gray linen duster buttoned to the throat, and carrying a suit-case and tightly strapped umbrella, entered the store. He gazed inquiringly at the assembled circle, his eyes wrinkling pleasantly at the corners.

"I just blew in," he observed to nobody in particular, "and I'm going to hang out for a few days at the best hotel in the town."

"The' ain't but one," volunteered the voluble Smith, stealthily moving his chair that he might get a look at the stranger's feet. They were neatly covered with tan Oxfords, he satisfied himself; but the toes were not pointed.

"Where'll I find it?" asked the stranger. "I'm an inspector from the Phœnix Fire Insurance Company," he added, correctly interpreting the suspicious glances leveled at him and his sparse belongings. "Expect to be in town two or three days, looking over our risks and correcting a map of the town."

"Takin' on any new risks?" inquired the man on the pickle barrel.

"W'y, yes; I ain't a regular soliciting agent for the Phœnix; but I'll be mighty glad to write any persons desiring insurance," replied the stranger. "My name," he added pleasantly, "is Todd, Albert Todd, at your service, gentlemen."

Mr. Todd bowed and smiled expansively.

"Wall, ye want t' cast yer eye over Hiram Plumb's property, fust thing you do," advised the liveryman, with a facetious grimace toward the individual on the pickle barrel. "It's in a fierce condition."

The gentleman in question slowly descended from his perch, thoughtfully caressing the seat of his trousers, as he replied in kind.

"Y' don't hev to worry none 'bout me, Mister Todd—if that's your name. I don't insure in the Phœnix; but Bud Hawley, him thet keeps the liv'rystable, is a teetotally bad risk. He's been takin' au-to-mo-beels t' board lately, an' they sure do risk up a dang'rous smell o' gasoline."

"I've got a permit," hastily interposed Mr. Hawley. "I c'n show it to you."

The stranger waved his hand deprecatingly.

"Oh, that's all right," he said gently. "I have nothing to do with that class of business. But if Mr. Hawley has a good horse and buggy to hire, I'll be glad to talk business. How about it, Mr. Hawley?"

Mr. Hawley favored the stranger with a comprehensive stare.

"Guess I got a rig 'at 'ud suit," he admitted. "Fi' dollars a day an' up, 'cordin' t' the sort o' fig you're lookin' for."

"I want," said Mr. Todd, "a good smart horse—one that can cover considerable territory in a day—and a buggy; nothing fancy, you know; but neat and comfortable."

"All right," said Mr. Hawley slowly. "I'm goin' along t' my place now; 't aint fur from the Eagle."

"Many folks stopping at the hotel?" inquired Mr. Todd, briskly, as the two men walked along the village street under the heavy noonday shade of the big maples.

"Not s' many," replied the liveryman noncommittally.

He scowled as a smart yellow-wheeled trap whizzed past.

"I dunno what sort of a driver you be," he said; "most anybody wants t' git over the ground these days; but the's some folks 'at thinks they c'n drive a horse like it was an automobeei. That's one o' my rigs an' one o' my best horses—or was till that chap took t' drivin' it."

Mr. Todd stretched his long neck after the yellow-wheeled trap, which had stopped in front of the Barford Eagle, a little farther up the street.

"What's the young man's line of business?" asked Mr. Todd. "I'd like to interest him in a little proposition——"

"Business?" echoed Mr. Hawley, and he chuckled as he drove his hands a little deeper into his trousers' pockets. "Dave's principal business around these parts is courtin', I sh'd say. If you git acquainted with him he'll tell you all about it."

To make the acquaintance of the ex-schoolmaster appeared to be exactly what the energetic Mr. Todd was seeking. He put up at the Eagle, where he made a point of asking for a six o'clock dinner.

SEEK A KINGLY CHARACTER*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

AS LONG as he sought the Lord, God made him to prosper." This is the Golden Text for the tory of Israel's kings. Histories were ot written to give us information about he personal lives of these men, but hat we might see our own actions re- ected in their conduct as in a mirror, nd so guide our lives accordingly. In heir fate we see the reward or pun- shment of our own present courses. These things happened to them as xamples, and are written for our earning." This saith the New Testa- ment. Yes, we may learn how we can elp God develop in us kingly charac- er. It is more important to be kingly han to be a king. Here in the United tates all boys are prospective sover- igns, soon to be "sovereign citizens," olding the ballot as a sceptre. Every oy appreciates the importance which ttaches to a crown prince—his health, is habits, his education, his character. Ie needs to be strong, inside and out, ot only for his own sake, but for his eople's sake. Well, every boy is the child of a King," destined to be not nly a sovereign citizen in this world, ut a king in heaven if he does not, by vickedness, lose his crown. How vatchful, therefore, should everybody e against everything that can harm he soul, not only for his own sake, but or God's sake and the sake of the vorld. Lesson after lesson illustrates he text that "righteousness exalteth a ation, but sin (literally) bows the eck of any people." Whenever Israel r Judah went wrong they "bowed the eck" to some foreign foe, as every sin o-day puts the man, and sometimes nany more with him, into bondage. Jehoshaphat was one of many to prove he Golden Text of to-day, that he who uts God and doing good first, gets the est of other things as well.

"Jehoshaphat, his son, reigned in is stead." Asa had died, and the ingly duties of the father fell on the on. Any day some young man in the Sunday School may have to take his father's place, and he should be get- ing ready to do his work as well— ndeed better, for every generation ought to start on one higher step than he one before it. Jehoshaphat "walked n the first ways of David" and of Asa also. A bad heredity is a handicap, ut there are thousands of cases where t has been overcome. Both Asa and Jehoshaphat were better than their fathers.

Civilization Versus War

"He placed forces in all the fenced cities." In those days of the world's half-savage childhood armaments seem o have been necessary. There were no peace societies. Even individual men carried arms, believing "the way to have peace was to be prepared for war." The expenditure of millions by nations for the purposes of war is equally absurd and uncivilized. A supreme court of united nations is as reasonable and practicable as a supreme court of the United States. However, in Jehoshaphat's day his thorough work in national defense was one of his creditable achievements. He knew that a people who came to fear God, and therefore feared nothing else, was the nation's best wall of defense—"every man a brick," as the king of Sparta said when the absence of a city wall was noted by a visitor.

His heart was lifted up in the ways of the Lord." Jehoshaphat was about to send out teachers to exhort the people to walk aright, and first of all he started to walk that way himself. Jehoshaphat's best lesson to his people was his own clean and unselfish life, devoted to the good of his people, a life that was both pure and prosperous. "He had riches and honor in abundance."

Teaching a Princely Work

"He sent his princes to teach in the cities of Judah; and with them the Levites." Some men are good, but not wise, and goodness without wisdom may be not only useless, but harmful. Jehoshaphat followed his negative work of tearing down an evil by positive work in creating a sentiment to support with popular conviction what had been done by governmental force. One of the most common failures of parents, teachers, pastors, reformers is that when they forbid a wrong indulgence they put nothing in its place. They drive out devils, but leave their old resorts empty so that other devils can come to take the vacant places. Wherever saloons are voted out, such social centres as the Young Men's Christian Association affords, and especially the railroad branches, should be multiplied.

Jehoshaphat's reform went deep, just as ours needs to go in the United States at this hour in a nation-wide campaign of intensified moral education, in Sunday Schools and public schools and out of school, in which the "princes" and "Levites" shall take a large part. Jehoshaphat counted teaching such a patriotic duty that he sent out as teachers the "princes," his own sons and royal relatives; and he counted it such a religious duty that he sent also the "Levites," the lay officers of the church, corresponding to elders, deacons and trustees. Since then the church has climbed from the dispensation of the prophets to the higher dispensations of the visible Christ and the invisible Holy Spirit, but the "princes" and Levites in American and British churches to-day lag behind those of Jehoshaphat's time.

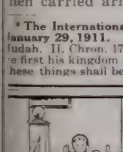
Does any one say or think there is not as great an emergency calling strong laymen to go out as teaching bands for the sake of the Church and State as in the days of Jehoshaphat, when the land had been corrupted with imported wickedness added to its own?

The emergency in the United States, both from a religious and patriotic point of view, is as great if not greater than in Jehoshaphat's day. Similar perils, weakening our churches and jeopardizing our political and patriotic interests in this twentieth century, are hovering over us. Since the Civil War several social evils have increased faster than the population. These include the consumption of liquors, murders, divorces, and general lawlessness. Just when the people most need the spiritual antidote that the churches might give, new theologies are conspiring to turn from the churches thousands whose fathers and grandfathers were devoted members. One of the most serious perils is that many children of Christian ancestry to-day do not attend divine worship. In fact, not more than ten per cent. of the young men to-day come in contact with any religious service. The best way to hold boys and young men in the Sunday School and church is for the strong men who bear the name of Christ to take an active, princely part in both, putting into the saving of their own boys and others the great talents they are using effectively in the less noble task of money-making.

World-wide Influence of National Uplift

"And Jehoshaphat waxed great exceedingly." The greatness of Jehoshaphat was not in war, but in a broad plan of national regeneration. He won the admiration of surrounding nations more by tearing down evils and toning up his people than by building forts. In his case a few nations were influenced, while to-day every nation that rises morally helps to lift all others in many ways. In individual as well as national life righteousness tends to peace. "When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him."

Having considered the story of Jehoshaphat's life let us single out one virtue that we all can and should repeat in our lives, that of moral courage. It is far easier to be brave on a battlefield under the inspiration of music and movement and multitude, than to condemn profanity or foul stories or parlor gambling or the social glass, when we must act alone and against the prevailing sentiment about us. Before these evils we play the coward. If we could only make civic cowardice as disgraceful as running away in battle or sacrificing a woman to save one's self in a wreck, we should have less of it. The cure for cowardice is a clearer vision of God. "How can we fear anything with him looking at us?"



Golden Text: 2 Chron. 17:1-13. Golden Text: "Seek ye first his kingdom and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you." Matt. 6:33.

Earthquake in Turkestan

A SERIOUS earthquake was reported from Eastern Turkestan on January 5. The capital town of Vyerny in the Government of Samiryetchensk, felt the full force of the seismic disturbance. This town had a population of 23,000, and unofficial reports announced that more than half were killed. Houses and stores were pulled down with great force and large fissures were left in the surrounding ground. The towns of Przhevalsk and Pishpek in the same province, each with a population of 8,000, are presumed to have been wholly destroyed. Communication with the disturbed section was cut off by the quake, and therefore there were no means of getting exact information. This part of Russian Turkestan has been always subject to violent shocks. Vyerny was badly damaged in 1897. In the Syr-Daria Valley alone there are twelve epicentres of seismic activity, and more than three hundred quakes have been recorded in the past few years. There is a stratum of rock formation extending from this section all along Southern Asia, and commotions run along it like electricity over a conducting rod. Seismographs in London, Paris and Washington recorded this latest earthquake.

Russian Turkestan has a total area of 650,000 square miles and about 6,000,000 population. The country is wretchedly poor, as the soil to a great extent is arid and barren, somewhat resembling the Russian steppes.

Young People's Societies

The North and East*

AMONG the most interesting of our immigrants in the East, are the French Canadians. Most of them are devoted Catholics, but there are many evangelical Protestant Christians among them. They are a bright and handsome race, fond of pleasure and yet generally good workers.

Many of the prize-winners in the missionary schools of New England have been French Canadians.

It is astonishing to see how many Poles have been crowding lately into New York and New England, usually preferring to settle in the country districts. The Poles are easier to interest in religion than are those of most other nationalities.

In one Massachusetts town where a Polish church has been established, many of the native families employ the Polish girls as domestic servants. Most of them are faithful, humble Christians. The little mission church there is accomplishing a great work.

Among these Polish men some fine characters are developed.

One was asked to serve as a night watchman for a few nights, as several burglaries had occurred in the town recently.

"How much shall we pay you?" inquired the "selectman" who was interviewing him.

The honest fellow threw up his hands with a scornful gesture.

"Nothing, nothing!" he cried. "I do it because I love this town."

He was a devoted member of this Polish missionary church.

The Italians congregate mostly in our cities. They seem to enjoy living in a few rooms, crowded to the limit, so long as they can be in the neighborhood of their countrymen.

In one of the "slum" districts of New York City, where a fine social settlement has been established, it is reported that the Irish and Germans furnished their "working material" twenty years ago.

Gradually the character of the neighborhood changed. In five or six years, the Irish and Germans had moved to other sections of the city (most of them having prospered enough to live in better quarters) and Italians had taken their places.

Now there are almost no Italians there. The Russian Jews, a persistent and pushing stock, now hold the field.

These social workers are conducting a wonderful mission among those humble, ignorant people.

A day nursery relieves the mothers who "work out," of the care of their infants during working hours. Trained nurses go into the homes and teach the mothers there how to care for the well babies and how to cure the sick, both old and young.

A kindergarten receives the little children. Mothers' meetings, boys' clubs, sewing and cooking classes for the girls, social evening gatherings with music and refreshments, and occasionally a good lecture, concert or other entertainment, help and attract the people.

The workers are usually devoted Christians, and as fast as they can gain the confidence and affection of their neighbors, they try to interest them in religion.

Though many of them do not call their establishments "missions," they are doing the same sort of work among these newly arrived immigrants that our foreign missionaries are doing in more distant places.

There is strong mission work needed in these older communities, many of them fast filling up with untaught foreigners who do not speak English.

Our society should hunt them out and devise ways of uplifting them.

A Missionary Message*

THROUGHOUT the Bible are scattered repeated prophecies that the whole world shall be blessed in the coming of Jesus; but the great promise in our text (given also in Gen. 12: 3) is the first definite assurance of the universality and glory of the gift of Christ's love.

It is a singular commentary upon the dullness of mankind that the lesson of democracy taught throughout the Scriptures should have been so hard to learn and so long deferred.

The tendency of humanity is to divide into classes. The powerful of all ages have considered it right for them, because of their strength, to seize and keep all that they could. Having established themselves firmly, they have proceeded to reduce to submission, or even to slavery, those who opposed them or whom they could capture.

Hence arose monarchies and hereditary peerages, separating certain powerful groups in each country from the masses of the people, and conferring honor upon the one and ignominy upon the other.

Even the Jews, the one nation which worshiped an invisible God and exalted righteousness above "the glory of kings," could not grasp the tremendous significance of the Gospel idea. They could not believe, though their poets and prophets had assured them that their long-promised Messiah would help the poor and needy, that he would include the poor and needy of any nation but the Jews.

They had been told that the isles would wait for him and that he should be "a light unto the Gentiles." But they could not believe the full truth. Even when with fiery eloquence Carey preached throughout the whole of England the duty of establishing missions, the vast mass of Christians remained indifferent to the fate of the heathen. The early missionary zeal of Paul's converts had then entirely died out. Even the great Reformation of the sixteenth century had failed to awaken any permanent interest in the conversion of those lying in darkness.

Not until a hundred years ago, when new methods of transportation and communication began to make practicable operations on a large scale in distant lands, did the great message to Abraham seem likely to attain fulfilment.

Now the world-wide "Students' Volunteer Movement" and the "Laymen's Missionary Movement" promise to prove that great word true.

It is remarkable that the first Protestant missions after the Reformation, though sent under the noblest auspices, should have been despatched to the most unpromising countries, and should have met with complete failure.

The first was sent from France in 1555, largely through the influence of that distinguished Huguenot, Gaspard de Coligni. It consisted of 314 men, and through treachery and wickedness, failed completely; but it has left to us many examples of exalted heroism.

In 1559, the great Gustavus Vasa sent a mission to Lapland. It also failed.

One of the most devoted of the early missionaries was the German, Peter Heyling. He has been compared to the saintly Henry Martyn. Young Heyling was deeply concerned for the welfare of the heathen, and started in 1632 for Abyssinia, where he labored faithfully for many years, though there are now to be seen no especial results from his efforts.

Let us think reverently of these unhappy martyrs to the cause of foreign missions. We talk often of the great successful missionaries. Let us not forget these who bore the bitterness of defeat as a climax to often unspeakable sufferings and sacrifices.

IS LIFE WORTH LIVING

Is life worth living? "It depends on t[illegible] liver."

This is an old answer to an old question an answer with a two-fold meaning.

The little organ that secretes bile is blam[illegible] for many ills and many crimes. Everythi[illegible] looks blue to the bilious person who has ov[illegible] taxed his liver with indigestible foods. It easy to charge everything to the liver.

Of course the trouble is not with the liv[illegible] but with the man who owns the liver. T[illegible] person with bounding health and vital vig[illegible] does not ask the question, "Is life worth l[illegible] ing?" Life is full of beauty and pleasure f[illegible] the person who eats simple, nourishing foo[illegible] and lives in accord with the laws of Natur[illegible] He enjoys every moment of work or pla[illegible] because every function of the body is pe[illegible] formed as Nature intended.

Life is sustained by the food we eat a[illegible] the air we breathe. These two elements, foo[illegible] and air, properly selected and appropriate[illegible] build the perfect human body. Now it oug[illegible] to be plain that the complete food for nou[illegible] ishing the perfect human body must conta[illegible] all the elements needed for making bon[illegible] brain, muscle and fat. One does not need [illegible] be a dietetic expert to understand that a foo[illegible] which contains one of these elements in exce[illegible] of what the body needs is not a perfect foo[illegible]

A perfect food is one which supplies to th[illegible] human body the elements needed for th[illegible] making of bone, tissue, and brain in the sam[illegible] proportions as we find them in the perfectl[illegible] developed human body. Has Nature provide[illegible] such a food? Yes. Whole Wheat is such[illegible] food. It has been man's "staff of life" f[illegible] 4,000 years. It contains all the element[illegible] found in the human body, and we find tha[illegible] these elements are in almost exactly the sam[illegible] proportion as in the human body. It contain[illegible] more nutriment than corn, oats or barley[illegible] and when properly prepared, is more easil[illegible] digested.

The experience of many hundreds of thou[illegible] sands of persons, combined with the testimon[illegible] of physicians and dietetic experts, proves tha[illegible] in Shredded Whole Wheat we have a foo[illegible] that contains all the nutritive elements of th[illegible] whole wheat prepared in their most digestibl[illegible] form. Shredded Wheat is, therefore, a per[illegible] fect food. In making Shredded Wheat th[illegible] wheat is cleaned and then steam-cooked fo[illegible] thirty-five minutes. It then passes into[illegible] shredding machines, which draw the kernel[illegible] of cooked whole wheat out into fine, filmy[illegible] porous shreds. These shreds are then formed[illegible] into Biscuits and Triscuits and baked.

High Prices and the Farmer

THERE is a belief, as general as it is baseless, that high prices indicate a scarcity of money. A little study of the laws governing economic conditions will show that the reverse of this is true. Riccardo, in treating of what he calls "the iron rule of wages," points out very clearly that in periods of high prices for the necessities of life, labor is the last to benefit by the rise, while it is the first to suffer from its consequences.

Are Farmers to Blame?

Another very general and equally erroneous belief is that the farmers are directly responsible for the high price of food and that, as a consequence, "they are all on the way to Millionaire's Row," as one unreasoning writer puts it. If it were true that our farmers are even half-way within sight of what might be called the "Comfortable Row," no man who knows of their hard, brave struggle in the past could have the heart to envy them; but if they are enabled to clear off their mortgages and have a little to spare for wise investment, it is not because of high prices but in spite of them.

We have been confirmed in this belief by a careful perusal of Secretary of Agriculture Wilson's last annual report. In this carefully considered document, Mr. Wilson puts the blame for high prices directly on the middleman, and he declares that it is time for the farmer and the consumer to get closer together, and organize mutual co-operative societies for the protection of each. Writing of the crops of 1910, the Secretary declares "nothing short of Omniscience can grasp the value of the farm products of this year." He fixes the value of the agricultural products, for the season just closed, at the enormous sum of $8,926,000,000. This is larger than the output in 1909 by $305,000,000, and no other country in the history of the world has ever come near it.

Fixing the Blame

In order to discover, where possible, the cause for high prices and to fix the responsibility, the Department made a careful investigation of the retail prices of articles of food in seventy-eight of our large cities, and then compared the price which the consumer paid with that which the farmer got. From the list furnished, we select a few, among them the one necessity—milk. In many cases it was found that the farmer received less than forty-five per cent. of the retailer's price, while the average was "a scant fifty per cent.," the latter in the smaller cities. "The other half," writes the Secretary, "goes to the railway companies for carriage, to the wholesale dealer, if there is one in the chain of distribution, and to the retailer who delivers at the consumer's door."

In the case of poultry, which is too high to be generally consumed, the farmer does better, receiving about sixty-nine per cent., while he receives considerably less than half the retailer's price for eggs, and about half for vegetables. It has been discovered, too, that the farmer's percentage of the consumer's price diminishes as the quantity sold at retail becomes smaller.

Buying and Selling Prices

The apple grower receives fifty-six per cent. of the consumer's price when he purchases by the bushel, and sixty-six per cent. when he purchases by the barrel, but less than twenty per cent. where the fruit is retailed by the single piece. The strawberry grower, who cultivates, picks, and baskets the fruit, and then delivers it on the cars, gets barely forty per cent. of what the consumer has to pay.

And so through the whole list of agricultural products, the man who produces gets less than the men who carry and who sell. It is true that the farmer gets more for what he sells today than did his grandfather or even his father, but so, too, the mechanic and the laborer get more for their work. All prices have gone up, and the chances are that they will not again return to the conditions of a generation ago, nor do we care to have them do so; but we could wish that the profits and the burdens were more equitably distributed.

Direct Sales

Mr. Wilson, in seeking a remedy for conditions that are becoming oppressive to the wage-earner, asks a question suggesting its own answer: "Why do not consumers buy directly from the farmers? A distribution of farm products in this simple way is already begun in England, where co-operative organizations of farmers are selling by direct consignment to co-operative organizations of consumers in cities. Farmers' co-operative selling organizations are numerous in this country, but co-operative buying associations, among the people of cities and towns, are few."

While lifting the blame for high prices from the shoulders of the farmers, where it has been placed by the middleman, Mr. Wilson holds that the consumers themselves are largely responsible for existing conditions, and he urges that the one remedy is co-operative buying. This plan works very well in England where the territory is comparatively small and the population is dense and homogeneous, but the conditions are so radically different in the United States that, while advocating the plan, we do so with a full realization of the unselfish work to be done and the enormous obstacles to be overcome.

How this co-operation might tell is well illustrated by this fact: Last spring, in parts of the North and Middle West, where there had been a great many excellent potatoes left over from the abundant crop of the year before, farmers were selling them at two and three cents a bushel, while within a day's railroad travel, to the east, they were retailing at a dollar a bushel, and at nearly double that where they were sold by a smaller measure. And the poor purchaser of a small measure of potatoes was told, if she had the hardihood to complain, that "the farmers are to blame for the high prices."

The Farmer's Share

We have asked ourselves, while reading Secretary Wilson's report: "What is the farmer's share of this enormous output?" Great as have been our corn crops in other years, that of this year exceeds them; it is 3,121,381,000 bushels, and it is valued at $1,500,000,000. This sum is sufficient to cancel the interest-bearing debt of the United States and to buy all the gold and silver mined in every country in the world in 1910, and still there would be a good balance left for the farmer; but the chances are that in settling up he gets the smaller share.

The cotton crop of 1910 will sell for about $900,000,000; the hay crop is estimated at $720,000,000; the spring and winter wheat at $625,000,000; oats at $380,000,000; potatoes and tobacco at $97,000,000, and other crops in proportion. We might well envy our 6,000,000 farmers if they were the recipients of these enormous sums, but they are not. The farmers, it is true, have done the hard work, but the men who get the great profits are those who control the prices and make life's necessities things with which to gamble.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK CITY

Pioneer in Christian Work

WILLIAM H. FALCONER, one of New York's best known Christian workers, is still "hale and hearty" though he has passed the limit set by the royal psalmist by more than a decade of years. Mr. Falconer bears the burden of age lightly and is as sprightly and active as many a man not half his years. His present physical condition shows the clean life that he has lived—a life devoted to the service of God and the betterment and uplifting of his fellow-men.

William H. Falconer

He has always been a worker; it is work that has kept him fit and able so long and given him a green old age now mellowing into a beauty and ripeness rarely seen in this country, where the race of life is so intense that most men drop out ere the course is half run.

William H. Falconer's great-great-grandfather, Pierre Fauconier, came over in 1705, as secretary to Lords Bellemont and Cornberry, the colonial governors of New York, who in a short time promoted him to the important position of collector of the port and province. Pierre Fauconier's son, John Fauconier, the great-grandfather of Mr. Falconer, held a commission in the Revolutionary army, and was aide-de-camp on General Washington's staff at the Battle of Chatterton's Hill at White Plains, where he was captured by the British, who confined him in the prison ship Jersey, anchored in New York Harbor. After the war, John Fauconier became supervisor of the town of White Plains, which position he occupied eighteen years.

The grandfather of Mr. Falconer was the first to so spell the name. This man, Roger Falconer, was a produce merchant in New York City. His son, the father of the present Mr. Falconer, was a builder and was very well to do and respected in the community.

William H. Falconer entered the real estate business in 1853, and had his office at 21 Second Street. He was but twenty-four when he was nominated for councilman in the seventeenth ward. He took much interest in the Society for Improving the Condition of the Poor, and Free Immigrant, and this interest has never abated. He early became a member of the Young Men's Christian Association, and has been a manager of the New York Bible Society since 1868. It was in 1864 that he joined the Old Bowery Village Church in Seventh Street. Here he was superintendent of the Sunday School. Then he moved a little farther uptown and became a member of St. Paul's. In 1876 he became one of the founders of the Madison Avenue Church.

In 1874 Mr. Falconer was elected treasurer of the New York City Extension and City Mission Society, which office he held for sixteen years. At the end of his time as treasurer, the society owned over a million dollars' worth of property with only about $100,000 indebtedness.

In 1884 Mr. Falconer was appointed to the Foreign Mission Board by the General Conference held at Philadelphia, and is still a member. He has been on the visiting committee of the City Mission Society for thirty years, and has visited one of the missions every Sunday when in town. When in London, he also visited some forty Wesleyan City Missions, getting ideas of their workings and systems. He has been for thirty years on the Advisory Board of the Old People's Home, and was for twenty years a trustee of the Hahnemann Hospital. He is still vice-president of the City Missionary Society and one of its property trustees. He is also a member of the Union League Club, the St. Nicholas Society, the Huguenot Society and the Sons of the Revolution.

He was in the real estate business continually from 1853 to 1893, this record making him the dean of the real estate operators of New York. His career in this field was characterized by honesty and integrity.

In his time Mr. Falconer traveled much. Between 1885 and 1890 he toured this country from Mexico to Alaska. Then he took a world trip with his family. He met many crowned heads and distinguished men and women of the time. He was entertained by the Governor of Hong Kong, the Empress of Japan, Sultan of Turkey, King of Greece and had an interview with Pope Leo XIII. The Falconers met Queen Victoria in France, and received from her the most gracious recognition.

pitching her forward, threw her into a hedge of thorns, a branch of which became entangled in her hair. This they refused to allow her to remove, and thus she was driven away with those ugly thorns scratching and lacerating her back at every step. I wonder if it had been any comfort to her if she had known that her Saviour once wore a crown of thorns.

The pastor set out at once for Midnapur, where the nearest missionary lived, and told him the story. The missionary went to the English magistrate and soon the police hastened to the rescue. The men who had stolen Muké carried her from place to place, blindfolded. Finally, frightened by the presence of the white man and police, they took Muké far into the jungle and left her there, still blindfolded. With the help of a kind-hearted shepherd boy she found her way again to Seba Pator's house, where once more she found comfort among friends. A few days later, she was taken to Midnapur and a safe home found for her in a Christian family, where she could work for her board, three meals a day, and go to kindergarten. She soon progressed far enough to be of service as an assistant teacher in the kindergarten and then married a Christian man. One little daughter has come to their home. As Muké looks into the face of her baby girl, her heart is overflowing with thanks that her little girl is blessed with a Christian home.

A month after Muké's rescue, five of the men connected with the attempt to steal her appeared before the magistrate and confessed their guilt.

A War-Time Diary*

THIS absorbingly interesting diary of one of the most interesting characters that our country has produced, will find a large public for itself. The biographical sketch is admirably done, and presents in striking colors a fresh picture of the opportunities of a poor boy in this free land. Few have wrestled with sterner poverty or more blighting obstacles than did Alexander Stephens, yet he rose to deserved distinction. His part in our national councils before the Civil War was great, and it was much greater in the Confederacy. He loved the Lost Cause nobly and unselfishly.

After using his best efforts to prevent his adored State from seceding, he threw in his fate with hers, conscientiously believing that his course was right.

Never was a more honestly religious man. He had the true Southern reverence for the Scriptures, and the true Southern love for the great literature of all ages and countries.

His letters furnished his opinions and his thoughts, up to the time of his captivity. Then begins his diary. It contains many important political facts, concerning the political history of the time. One who seeks to trace the real personality of a man, finds it in the trifles of his history.

Pathetic is the story of his love. Once and yet again his heart yearned for a mate, but his poverty and his invalidism kept him back from any disclosure of his feelings.

His love for his brother Linton seems to have been the great sustaining passion of his life.

He prefaces his diary with an account of his progress from his home in Georgia to Boston. He was for many years a dyspeptic, and his descriptions of his various meals are therefore naturally rather minute; but this leads to many disclosures of general interest, such as that the price of a can of tomatoes at that time was $1; and that his abstemiousness in regard to liquors was so great, at a period when hard drinking was common and not heavily reprehended, that he had probably never drunk in all, three gallons of liquor in his life until 1842, when he was obliged by the doctor's orders to use it as medicine.

The disagreements between Stephens and Jefferson Davis, which are known to have been frequent and radical, are emphasized and explained in this volume.

But much as Mr. Stephens deprecated what he considered the blunders of the "misguided" president of the Confederacy, he refused to believe that Jefferson Davis for a moment countenanced the assassination of Lincoln.

As Mr. Stephens reflects upon the awful sacrifices which the South had made in order to secure its independence and the utter failure of its high hopes, he seems to feel his mind reeling, and writes a profound analysis of insanity.

"Lunatics," he says, "are mental comets. But not one mind moves around the true, great centre in a perfect circle. All aberrate more or less."

The book contains much of such incidental philosophizing, as well as illuminating facts of deep historical import.

Its clear type adds greatly to its attractiveness. It is well printed and arranged throughout.

Among the Workers

—AN AGED invalid, paralyzed and unable to go out, writes appealing to some reader of this journal in Texas, to help procure her a roller chair. Her address is Mrs. M. I. N. Whipple, Fort Arthur, Tex. Possibly some kind-hearted reader may be able to give the needed help.

—MR. A. NELSON, a Philadelphia reader, writes of a visit to the Mayesville, S. C., Industrial Institute after the recent fire: "Their struggle to raise the money to equip them for the winter's work was a hard one, and had hardly been fully started when the fire occurred, causing a loss of $1,800. Since then their needs have been nearly overwhelming."

—EVANGELISTS HART and Magann, of Fairbury, Ill., have just closed a revival meeting in Millville, N. J. There were over 400 "seekers" in the three weeks' services and some very remarkable conversions took place. The two mass meetings on Sunday afternoons for men only filled the largest building in the city. Great interest was manifested in these meetings. Over fifty conversions the last day. These evangelists go to Barberton, O., where all the churches have united and are erecting a large tabernacle for the meetings.

—THE JUBILEE year of Woman's Work in Foreign Missions has arrived. The Woman's Union Missionary Society, organized in 1860, and incorporated in 1861, will hold its fiftieth anniversary on January 18 in the Collegiate (Middle) Church, Second Avenue and Seventh Street, New York. Fifty years ago independent organizations of women for any purpose were exceedingly rare; and this society has been educative from the start. It also solved a problem in economics and proved the possibility of a voluntary organized work with unsalaried officers. It is a remarkable fact, also, that the society has never been in debt, while its seven centres of missionary work in India, China and Japan are well equipped for service along educational, evangelistic and medical lines. Its first work was started in the zenanas of India, and the schools and hospitals under its care take high rank in these countries. A Jubilee Fund is being raised in commemoration of this fiftieth anniversary of organized work for women in Oriental lands.

A Notable Golden Wedding

THE large CHRISTIAN HERALD Family will be interested in a pleasant event which took place at the home of two of its members, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Lawrence, of Calhoun, S. C. This venerable couple celebrated their golden wedding anniversary on November 8. Mr. Lawrence lives in the old homestead which his grandfather secured from the government more than a hundred years ago. He was born in the house in which his golden wedding was celebrated. It was originally a log structure, with the ample fire-places which our grandparents deemed necessary. It has been covered with weather-boarding, but in a few places the logs still show as firm and solid as when it was built. The wedding journey, in 1860, was made from Meridian, Miss., the home of the bride, to Calhoun, S. C., by wagon, there being few railroads in the South at that time. To Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence have been given seven sons and five daughters, all of whom were present at the golden anniversary of their parents.

FAMILY OF FIVE

All Drank Coffee From Infancy

It is a common thing in this country to see whole families growing up with nervous systems weakened by coffee drinking.

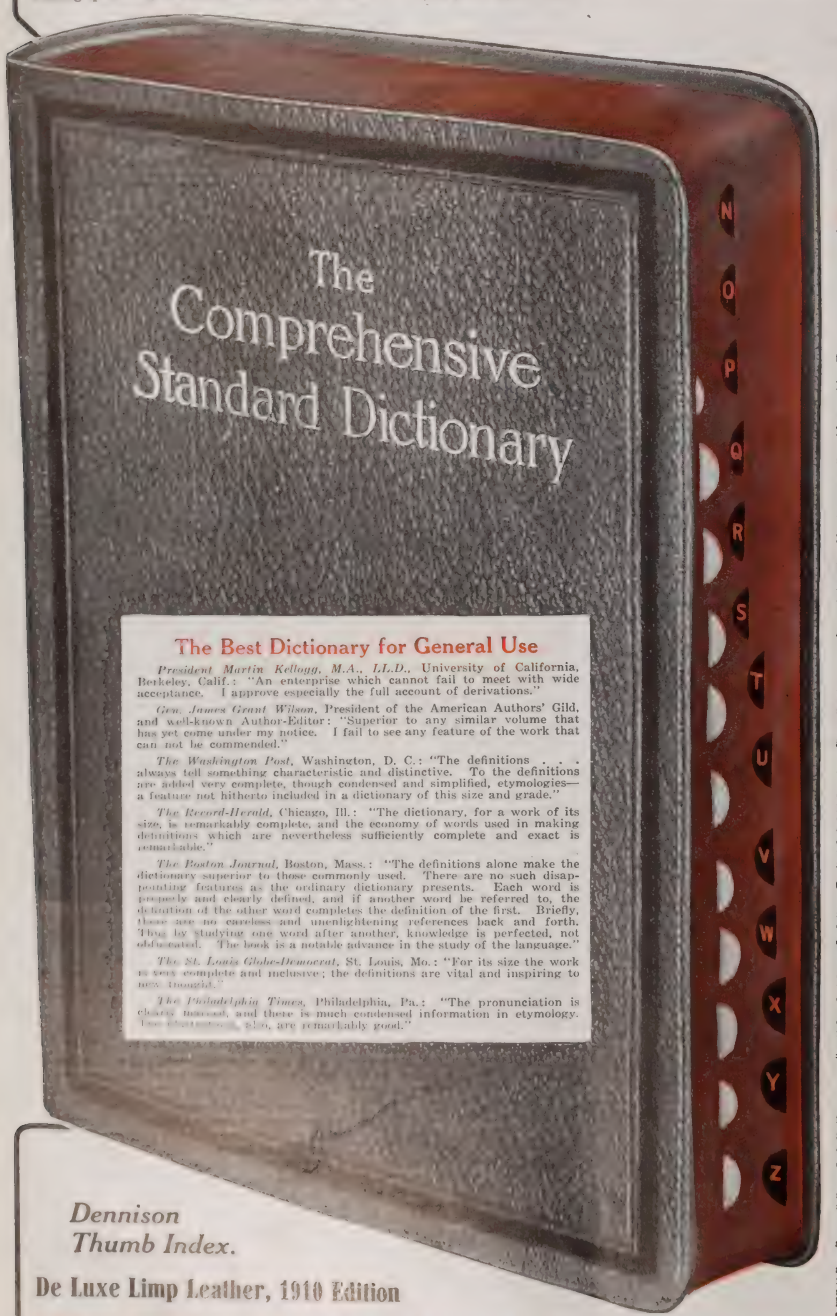
That is because many parents do not realize that coffee contains a drug—caffeine—which causes the trouble.

"There are five children in my family," writes an Iowa mother, "all of whom drank coffee from infancy up to two years ago.

"My husband and I had heart trouble and were advised to quit coffee. We did so and began to use Postum. We now are doing without medicine and are entirely relieved of heart trouble.

(Caffeine causes heart trouble when continually used as in coffee drinking.)

"Our eleven-year old boy had a weak digestion from birth, and yet always craved, and was given, coffee. When we changed to Postum he liked it and we gave him all he wanted. He has been restored to health by Postum and still likes it.



"Long live the discoverer of Postum!" "Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

This Dictionary is so thoroughly helpful in contents, so practical and comprehensive, that its value to the home, to the school teacher, the Sunday Schools, the boys and girls at school; in fact, to each and every member of the family, cannot be estimated. Costing nearly $1,000,000 to produce, and years of work by 257 of the world's leading specialists, this dictionary has for the past 15 years, in its larger shape, enjoyed greater confidence and esteem than has ever been accorded any other work of its kind, while even at its high price its sale has been beyond all precedent. In all its present shape, designed as it is for convenient use in the home, or in school, or among teachers, wherever they may be, and with its information brought down to date, it will establish a new record for enormous popularity. The Best Dictionary for General Use

President Martin Kellogg, M.A., LL.D., University of California, Berkeley, Calif.: "An enterprise which cannot fail to meet with wide acceptance. I approve especially the full account of derivations."

Gen. James Grant Wilson, President of the American Authors' Gild, and well-known Author-Editor: "Superior to any similar volume that has yet come under my notice. I fail to see any feature of the work that can not be commended."

The Washington Post, Washington, D. C.: "The definitions . . . always tell something characteristic and distinctive. To the definitions are added very complete, though condensed and simplified, etymologies—a feature not hitherto included in a dictionary of this size and grade."

The Record-Herald, Chicago, Ill.: "The dictionary, for a work of its size, is remarkably complete, and the economy of words used in making definitions which are nevertheless sufficiently complete and exact is remarkable."

The Boston Journal, Boston, Mass.: "The definitions alone make the dictionary superior to those commonly used. There are no such disappointing features as the ordinary dictionary presents. Each word is properly and clearly defined, and if another word be referred to, the definition of the other word completes the definition of the first. Briefly, there are no careless and unenlightening references back and forth. Thus by studying one word after another, knowledge is perfected, not obfuscated. The book is a notable advance in the study of the language."

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat, St. Louis, Mo.: "For its size the work is very complete and inclusive; the definitions are vital and inspiring to new thought."

The Philadelphia Times, Philadelphia, Pa.: "The pronunciation is clearly marked, and there is much condensed information in etymology. The illustrations, also, are remarkably good."

De Luxe Limp Leather, 1910 Edition

Edited by James C. Fernald, L. H. D.

The high standing of the Editor, James Champlin Fernald, L. H. D., is a sufficient guaranty for the accuracy, comprehensiveness and general excellence of the work. In his treatment the Editor has kept constantly in mind the necessity of giving in the simplest form the Orthography, Pronunciation, Definition and Derivation of all words that are not self-defining. Such adjectives, adverbs, and abstract nouns as are self-explanatory when the root-word is understood have been generally given in one paragraph under the root-word.

1.—The Vocabulary

Its vocabulary will be found exceptionally comprehensive and exact.

2.—Orthography

In orthography it is conservative; but when two ways of spelling the same word are sanctioned by usage, the two forms have been recorded, and preference has been given usually to the simpler form. In general, the spelling will be found to conform to the decision of the Standard Dictionary Committee of fifty leading Philologists and Educators, and to that adopted by the best authorities.

3.—Capitalization

Only such words as should be written with capital initial letters are capitalized in the vocabulary, thus enabling any person using the work to see at a glance how to write the word. The introduction of this feature specially distinguishes the Comprehensive Standard Dictionary from all other dictionaries.

4.—Pronunciation

The Standard Scientific Alphabet has been used to indicate the pronounciation of all words. This alphabet was prepared and promulgated by the American Philological Association, and indicating as it does with a minuteness and accuracy unattained by all other systems for conveying sounds, it is the simplest aid to exact pronunciation yet devised.

5.—The Definitions

Special care has been taken to make the definitions as comprehensive as possible by embracing recent meanings and distinctions, and by making the general definitions thoroughly inclusive. The most common meaning has been placed first, the others following in the order of their divergence. The aim has been to secure simplicity of expression, conciseness of statement, brevity and clearness. Where definition by synonym is employed, scrupulous care has been taken to define the unfamiliar by the familiar word, or by a word which is itself more fully defined in its own place.

6.—Compounding

The German double hyphen is used to distinguish hyphenated compound words from compounds in which the words originally distinct are united without the hyphen.

7.—Etymologies

The etymologies have been given in a clear form, tracing each word as far as practicable to its ultimate source, that the reader may know how the word originated, and how it came to have its present signification. The introduction of etymologies is a wholly new feature not found in any other dictionaries of this scope and design. All important prefixes and suffixes receive separate treatment in alphabetical place.

MEMORIAL TO DR. KLOPSCH

Happy Children on a Summer's Outing at the Children's Home

THE quotations in the centre of this page are from the Life Work of Louis Klopsch. They have evoked such a tremendous response in the form of letters containing suggestions, that we feel it to be our duty to give recognition in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to what seemingly is becoming a universal desire.

We have already published several of these letters, in all of which some form of memorial to Dr. Klopsch is called for, and in the majority of which the Endowment of Mont-Lawn is the chief suggestion.

The Christian Herald Gladly Co-operates

We welcome the idea heartily, because none knew better than his associates in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, how near and dear to his heart was the Home for the Children which he had founded. Indeed, during the last year of his life it would seem that our departed chief thought more of the well-being of Mont-Lawn than he did of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD itself, although that seems hardly possible, inasmuch as it was THE CHRISTIAN HERALD which enabled him to accomplish so much along charitable lines. We are sure, as the author of his Life-work has so well stated, that had he himself been asked to choose, Mont-Lawn would have been the only monument he would have desired.

The complete endowment of such an institution, however, is a task which should not be lightly undertaken. Thousands of dollars will be needed and can be raised only with the help of the thousands of friends who knew and loved him. We feel that he would not have desired any one benevolent person to have completed the endowment of his favorite charity. We are sure that he would have preferred every one of his thousands of friends to have at least a small part in the work, and we know that were he alive to-day and felt himself called upon to ask those friends for that small part, every one of them would have responded gladly.

On the other hand, the letters we have received prove that although he has passed away, his friends desire to show themselves as loyal to his memory as they were to him in life.

A Way To Accomplish It

But how shall it be accomplished? March 7, the first anniversary of his death, is approaching, and it would be more than fitting if the proposed memorial, which would stand forever in his name, could be assured by that date.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD desires to do its part and it can help the thousands of its readers who were Dr. Klopsch's friends, to do their part. It was the ambition of Dr. Klopsch to send THE CHRISTIAN HERALD regularly into one million homes, because of the tremendous influence for good it would have throughout the world. Such a subscription list would insure a weekly congregation of five million souls. Think of the effect this would have upon the uplift of the world at large! Think of the far-reaching influence THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S religious messages, its sermons, its Bible teachings, its Sunday School lessons, etc., would have in those homes where now perhaps there shines no light of religion! A million CHRISTIAN HERALDS read by five million people, of all classes, every week—a Greater CHRISTIAN HERALD Family of FIVE MILLION ACTIVE MEMBERS!

Dr. Klopsch knew that this was well within the realm of possibility. He could sit at the loom of contemplation and weave pictures of the greatest single agency for good the world ever knew, and had he lived, he would undoubtedly have realized his dream.

None knew better than he what the influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD meant. Without that influence he could never have promoted the great charitable enterprises which bore his name. Mont-Lawn itself could not have been made possible without it, and Mont-Lawn to-day looks to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as its chief almoner. If Mont-Lawn is to be endowed as a Memorial to Dr. Klopsch, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD must take the lead in bringing this desirable condition to pass. And so, dear friends, we make the following proposition:

50 Per Cent. of Our Subscription Receipts to Be Given to This Memorial

In order to make this Memorial Fund successful and to insure a sufficient Endowment Fund for the Children's Home, without exposing our readers to any financial expense, one-half of all subscription money that we may receive from this date, Jan. 25, to March 7, 1911, for new subscriptions (one year or more) to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will be credited to the Endowment Fund of the Children's Home, excepting for subscriptions sent us by agents who deduct their agent's commission. Furthermore, each amount turned over to the Endowment Fund will be credited in the name of the person sending it in. For instance, if you induce four of your friends or acquaintances to subscribe to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year each, we will turn over $3.00 of the money (75 cents each) to the Treasurer of the Memorial Fund, entering it in your name, and publishing your name in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as having contributed $3.00 to the Children's Home Endowment Fund.

Interest Your Friends

It is thus possible for a subscriber to contribute any amount to this fund without costing him or her a single penny. How many friends have you who would be benefited by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD? You can easily induce them to subscribe.

If every subscriber secured only one new subscriber, the Endowment would amount to $225,000. Think of it—a quarter of a million dollars for the Children's Home Endowment, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S power for good doubled.

Perhaps you think it difficult to secure this one new subscriber? Why not try right now? You will probably find it easier than you thought, and it will encourage you to keep on, and secure more new subscriptions than you had dared hope for.

There are many people in your community who do not receive THE CHRISTIAN HERALD regularly. Probably many of them have no Christian literature to speak of. Wouldn't THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with its bright and interesting pages be a help and an inspiration? Wouldn't you be doing a commendable act in suggesting THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as a suitable magazine for some of these people? THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has influenced many to seek clean and upright careers. It can and it wants to help many more. With your assistance, and with your love and devotion to the common cause for which we are all striving, many, many new readers can be brought into the fold. It's all a matter of trying. Won't you try now?

You May Become a Patron

Every friend who is instrumental in sending us $15.00 for 10 subscriptions, thereby contributing $7.50 toward the Endowment of the Children' Home, will be recognized as a Patron and his name will appear on the Roll of Patrons, to be inscribed upon a set of Memorial Tablets on the inner walls of the Children's Temple, where Dr. Klopsch for fifteen years led the exercises, with thousands of delighted little ones as audience. These Tablets, lighted by the beautiful stained glass windows, will be visible to all as a permanent record of the patrons' gifts.

We feel sure that by this arrangement and the co-operation of our friends enough money will be contributed to Mont-Lawn to endow it forever, as a Memorial to Dr. Klopsch.

And so, dear friends, we cannot too earnestly urge you to do your part with the help of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. There is no time to be lost. Remember, it is only a short month until March 7, the anniversary of the day Dr. Klopsch died, the day upon which we hope the Endowment of Mont-Lawn and the Memorial to Dr. Klopsch will have become assured.

"I Love God and Little Children"

—Louis Klopsch

"IT was Dr. Klopsch's hope that the Children's Home—his favorite benevolence—might ultimately be endowed, so that it should be beyond any need of annual appeals. Had he lived, he undoubtedly would have accomplished his purpose; but called away from his labors by death, he left the unfinished task as a legacy to those who have been the friends and supporters of this beautiful benevolence for many years, knowing that they would not fail to perpetuate the work he had so lovingly founded and so successfully conducted. Had he been asked to choose, Mont-Lawn would have been the only monument he would have desired. 'I Love God and Little Children,' was written over its gates by Dr. Klopsch's direction. He put his own best love and service into this beneficent work. He spent there what he used to recall as the most enjoyable days of his life, among the little children. Let Mont-Lawn be his Monument, a permanent institution and a Memorial to his great love for the children of the poor!

"Shortly after his death, when the subject of its endowment as a lasting memorial to his memory was brought up by some friends, President Taft, hearing of the matter, spoke to the Rev. J. Wesley Hill in cordial commendation of the Children's Home, and added that if the movement for its endowment were started, he would be glad to be a contributor.

"It is confidently hoped that when this generous approval from so high a source is made public, many friends will be found willing to co-operate liberally in the proposed endowment, so that the 'Children's Paradise' may be put on a permanent and enduring footing."—From "The Life Work of Louis Klopsch," Page 307.

A Typical Bit of Cuban Landscape

Along the Beautiful Prado, Havana

THE SITUATION IN CUBA TO-DAY

By CHARLES M. PEPPER

CUBAN news and Cuban views always should be distinguished from Cuban rumors. At times rumors come from that rich island of trouble ahead. The prospect of maintaining stable government will be reported as discouraging, and there will be dark hints of something that may happen.

This has recently been the situation. Now, the truth about Cuba is that, like most tropical countries or like many Latin-American countries, the unexpected frequently happens, but the expected does not come to pass. So, when the rumors are thickest about trouble, it is reasonably sure that everything will go on in the usual way.

A general rule has been that when the sugar crop was large and prices were good everything could be counted on to run smoothly. This is a safe rule, but, like all rules, it has had an occasional exception. Certainly, the recent crops of Cuban sugar and the prospective crops have nothing disquieting about them. Sugar has been fetching a good price, and the crop has all the time been increasing. I can remember when the promise of a crop of 1,000,000 tons was looked on as insuring both stability of government and the prosperity of the people. This was just after the insurrection against Spain and the war by the United States which resulted in freeing the island. In the period of devastation and destruction which had preceded that war, the sugar crop had dropped to a few hundred thousand tons. It came rapidly up again after the American military occupation, and has continued to grow in the amount of production since, except during one or two bad seasons. Climatic conditions, such as a drought, affect the crop. It will startle many people to know, however, that Cuba has got so far beyond the million-ton mark in its production of sugar that it is now looking forward to 2,000,000 tons. The last crop was in the neighborhood of 1,800,000 tons.

This Cuban sugar production means much to the whole world, and especially to the United States. It is one thing that has kept the price of sugar nearly even, when nearly every other article of consumption has doubled in price and has thus added to the high cost of living. How much sugar Cuba will produce before the limit is reached is pure guess work. We only know that new lands are being brought under cultivation all the time and that old plantations, by applying modern methods, are being made more productive.

An Ox-Cart on the Prado, Havana

A Farm Laborer's Cabin

The richness of its soil is what makes Cuba one great sugar plantation. The area throughout the world for the growth of sugar cane is of course limited to tropical or semi-tropical lands. Cuba happens to have more of the conditions which favor the cane than other tropical countries that raise sugar.

A humorous illustration of the richness of its soil was once given by Captain-General Tacon, one of the famous men that Spain sent out to govern the island under the old despotic rule, when the Captain-General, representing the mother country, possessed almost absolute powers. Tacon was walking in the country one day with a newly-arrived friend. The latter poked his cane into the soil to see how deep the rich black loam ran. He did not touch bottom, so to speak, but finding some difficulty in pulling the cane out was going to leave it there, when the Captain-General hastily said to him, "Don't do that; for if you do, by to-morrow that cane will be grown into a tree."

Cuba, however, is something more than a big sugar plantation. The peculiar qualities of the soil in the western part of the island are such that a tobacco is produced there which is unequaled in any part of the world. This region is not very extensive and that is the reason why this tobacco is so valuable. Other grades are produced in other parts of the island, of good quality, but they are not quite up to that which comes from the western end.

The raising of tropical fruits, such as oranges, pineapples and bananas, is also an important factor in the national wealth. Some of the banana lands on the north coast have been turned into sugar plantations, but the growing of oranges and similar fruits makes a very successful industry, and many Americans who settled in Cuba are succeeding at it. The question is one of the market rather than of the means of producing fruit.

In a tropical country such as Cuba, country life naturally predominates over city life. The great majority of the Cubans live on the plantations, or in the smaller towns. Generally they are peaceful and industrious, for, as a matter of fact, no sugar plantation can be successfully managed without industrious laborers. The same is true of fruit farmers. The country people are also less disposed to

THE SECRET OF PEACE

TEXT: John 14:27—"Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth give I unto you."

MEN make their last will and testament, leaving to their kindred and friends their possessions. The Master also had a parting bequest to make. Silver and gold he had none; but he left them his estate, his estate of peace, the inheritance of calm joy. He bequeathed to them the treasure of his heart. "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you." If that was a possible thing; if such a bequest held good, as the codicil of a will, what a regal legacy it was! If it was more than a pious wish, if it was a fact, was there ever such a last will and testament? To have his certitude of tread, his serenity of soul, his secret of life which made him calm at the heart amid all the storms and distresses of an earthly lot; to have the quality which made his life the wonder of the world, could any bequest be really more valuable? For peace is the dream of the race. At the bottom of all our strivings, the explanation of all our ceaseless efforts is this dream. All our ambitions and desires have this at the root. A man gives himself to pleasure, or he works for money or power. But it is not for the things themselves, but for the supposed satisfaction of heart they will bring.

The World Cannot Give Peace

Blindly, instinctively we stretch out our hands and clutch for the things we think will give us heart's ease and a satisfied life. Men do not love money in itself: it is not the mere gold of scrip that men strive and toil for. You do them wrong to think that such a poor thing can be the ultimate aim of even the man who passes for a money-grubber. He has a soul above that. He invests it with imaginative, almost romantic, properties. It is not itself, but what it stands for, what it can do, or is supposed to be able to do; the security it can give from many evils, its power to beat back the distresses of poverty; the capacity it has for pleasure and the satisfaction of desire. They are not always low desires: they may be even very high and noble desires, the opportunity of doing good and carrying forward plans of large reach, the opportunity for acquiring knowledge, of enriching the life with all that art and the best thought of man can do. If we are dupes, we are not always ignoble dupes. What all men long for and strive after is the state of blessedness these particular things are supposed to give. Our aim, beneath all surface aims, is to attain to peace, content of heart, a satisfied life. If Christ then bequeathed that to his disciples, it was indeed a regal legacy.

But when we read the further description it seems as if he were playing with words. He says, "Peace, but not as the world giveth, give I," and that seems a fatal limitation of the gift. By this we have a suspicion that he is taking away what he appeared to give. And yet, when we think of it, is it not a necessary description of peace? For, if there is to be peace at all, it must be not as the world giveth; for the world has never succeeded in giving it to any son of man. Peace is the dream of the race: dispeace is the experience of the race. For a few years men long for happiness, and perhaps achieve it: for ever they are longing for rest. The world cannot give it with all its good gifts; for it belongs to a region which the world cannot reach. The world can give you happiness; it cannot give you blessedness. The world can give you pleasure; it cannot give you joy. The world can give you distractions; it cannot give you peace. These better things are states of the heart, inward gifts, the water of a fountain that springs up from within, conditions of the soul. To win true peace a man must have his thirst for the infinite appeased: he needs to feel himself held in the keeping of eternal love: he needs to have his soul satisfied and no earthly gift can bring that appeasement.

The Soul's Search for Peace

We cannot even get near the secret till we give up the belief, or even the hope, that the world can give it. It is not as the world giveth. Wherever else, it is certainly not there! Let the man most fortunate in his surroundings, rich in all the possibilities and opportunities of life, with every avenue of pleasure and power and ambition and knowledge open to him, let him say if the world can give peace. Sometimes it is only when all the gifts of fortune, the world's good things, are torn from a man, that he learns how futile they were, and how little they really did for the satisfaction of life. Shakespeare makes Wolsey in his fall, when his high-blown pride broke under him, realize this. When the killing frost nipped the root of his ripening greatness he saw how insecure the foundation of his life had been; and when his servant Cromwell came to him expecting to find him unmanned, and asked how he was, his answer was:

> Never so truly happy, my good Cromwell.
> I know myself now; and I feel within me
> A peace above all earthly dignities,
> A still and quiet conscience . . .
> . . . too much honor:
> O, 'tis a burden, Cromwell, 'tis a burden,
> Too heavy for a man that hopes for heaven.

Dante in exile, driven from all he held dear in life, visited a monastery to leave there the first portion of the Inferno. The story of his visit is told by the prior of the monastery. "As he was unknown to me and my brethren, I asked him, 'What would you?' And he answered not a word, but gazing at the building, I asked him again what he sought. He then, looking round upon me and my brethren, answered, 'Peace.'" How typical of man and the whole life of man the incident was, as Dante turned his burning eyes upon the wondering monks and asked out of his sorrowful heart the one word, "Peace." There was no peace for him, except the peace of soul, which might come from detachment from the vulgar struggles and ambitions of men in Florence. If he could not find it in his Divina Commedia, he could never find it in the fair City of Flowers.

At the risk of wearisome iteration, this has to be said, and repeated: that peace is independent of outside conditions. We cannot advance one inch towards the secret till we see and confess that it is not as the world giveth. Think of the Master when he left this legacy, and spoke so calmly of "My peace." With failure behind him in the world's judgment: and before him a cross! A man of sorrows and acquainted with grief! And yet with a serenity of soul, and quiet of heart, with peace brooding in his eyes as he looked beyond the tumult to the triumph. It was a quality of soul, not an accident of fortune.

Spiritual Torpor Is Not Peace

Look at Paul his servant, who spoke so much of peace, who had learned Christ's secret, writing about peace to his fellow-believers. He was in prison, after a life of terrible toil and terrible privation, with the care of all the churches, with troubles on every side, fighting without and fears within; a broken and scarred life! Yet as he bore on his body the marks of the Lord Jesus, so he carried in his heart the peace of the Lord Jesus. Surely, surely, not as the world giveth.

We find it hard to accept this, hard to give up our feverish attempts to reach peace by outside means. We put down our unrest and dispeace to our uncongenial conditions. If only we had a sweeter environment it would be well with us, we think. It is true that the world sometimes gives a false peace, an appearance of tranquillity of life, when all things go well with a man, and prosperity abounds, and the granaries are full, when health is given and capacity for pleasure. The soul sleeps easily in such days of peace and slumberous calm. But spiritual torpor is not peace; for what about the awakening that must come? Or there may be a spurious peace which is the fruit of ignorance, from a conscience not too enlightened, a taste not too refined, a mind that has never seen the better part of life, from stupid contentment with the lower part, from what Carlyle calls a brutal lethargy.

But this is the damning fact about all forms of worldly peace: that there is no security and no permanence of tenure even. It is a capricious thing, accidental. A slight rearrangement of details, and the palace of dream vanishes. What the world gives, the world can take away, and will take away. None of the world's gifts are evil in themselves, and they may be good gifts of God. The reason why we must not love the world is not because it is evil, but because it is transient. It passeth away. At the best it is not sufficient, it is not adequate as the stay of life. The most fortunate circumstances are only fortuitous after all. At the world's banquet, the richest and rarest, there is suspended the fatal sword of Damocles hung by a hair; and the hair will wear through some time.

Faith the Pathway to Peace

Apart from this transient character of the world's peace, its quality also is poor and threadbare, and men feel its failure even when they possess it. There are few more impressive and more pathetic pages in literature than those in which Count Tolstoy describes the emptiness and vanity of worldly things in his Confessions. He was a nobleman, in pre-eminently happy circumstances, with a continually increasing income, respected by friends, praised by strangers, happy in his home-life, with a great position and reputation as an author, enjoying the best of mental and physical strength; and yet he, a healthy and happy man, was brought to feel that he could live no longer. He had to fight against the temptation to commit suicide. He gave up carrying a gun because it offered too easy a way of getting rid of life. The reason was because he felt that life had no meaning for him. He was not content just to exist, and that was all he was doing. His life viewed from the point of reason had no reason for continuance. It seemed a foolish and wicked joke played on him by he knew not whom. He gave himself up to knowledge, and studied science, but all in vain; the same torturing sense of meaninglessness remained.

He came to see and confess that faith alone gave man an answer as to the meaning of life, and the consequent possibility of living. He saw that faith alone could clothe with infinity the finite existence of man, and give a meaning to life which triumphs over suffering, privation, and death. But though he came to understand this, his heart was none the lighter for it. He the rich and learned and illustrious nobleman envied the peasant for his quiet faith. At last when he came humbly to Jesus and bent his neck to the yoke of Christ, he too entered into the inheritance of peace. In the introduction to his next book, he wrote: "For thirty-five years of my life I was a man who believed in nothing. Five years ago faith came to me; I believed in the doctrine of Jesus, and my whole life underwent a sudden transformation. What I had wished for I wished for no longer, and I began to desire what I had never desired before. What had once appeared to me right now became wrong, and the wrong of the past I beheld as right. My soul, once filled with despair of life and fear of death, is now full of happiness and peace."

Oneness With Christ Gives Peace

It is so with every soul of man that comes to Christ and learns of him. He brings us into the same relationship with God as he enjoyed. His peace came from a direct sense of sonship with the Father; and in him we too are children, and should have the same peace in our hearts, the peace of perfect love, the peace of forgiveness, and reconciliation, and communion. To know peace a man needs to feel himself pardoned, and sustained by God, and in harmony with his will. Such a blessed state alone can bring heart's ease. The secret of it is submission to Christ, as Lord and Master, whose we are and whom we serve. This peace begins with the forgiveness of sins, and reconcilement to God; but it can only be kept by communion, by a life of discipleship, following Christ, thinking his thoughts, and doing his will, and choosing his way.

So, it is not a peace with the world by compromise, by base connivance, by giving in to its spirit. But this peace is possible even when in the world there is tribulation. Adversity is its opportunity. With the roar of life in ears and brain, we can still be calm. In the busy market-place, in the crowded street, amid the strife of tongues and the weary ways of men, we can be at peace because our hearts are fixed. There is no room for fear or lasting trouble. "My peace I give unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid." "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusted in thee."

Where Shall I Spend Eternity?

WHERE shall I spend eternity?
My days are gliding by;
But since my Lord has died for me,
Why should I fear to die?

Where shall I spend eternity?
O solemn, sacred thought!
But on the cross of Calvary
My soul with blood was bought.

Where shall I spend eternity?
In heaven the plan was made
To bruise the Son of God for me;
Oh, what a price was paid!

Where shall I spend eternity?
In endless bliss I may—
My heart, my soul, be on thy guard,
Oh watch, and trust and pray.

An Old-time Revival

WE SING about "old-time religion," talk about it and pray for it, yet many in our day have never seen a real "old-time revival." God sent to Syracuse, Ind., lately a measure of old-time revival power in answer to prevailing prayer. Four churches united in the battle. God so worked among the people that many said they had never seen anything like it before in the history of the town. Many declared that there was more time spent in prayer than in any previous revival ever held in the place; more confession and forgiveness of sins; more straightening out the past; more crying to God then ever before.

Most of the business places closed evenings during the revival meetings, which lasted for six weeks. Many in the church confessed their backslidden condition, and turned to God with fasting and prayer. Many church members, with tears, asked each other's forgiveness; some wrote letters to distant friends asking pardon for wrongs done. A saloonkeeper's wife was so under conviction that she prayed all night for deliverance. A business man, who had been a prominent church member for years, but had never had a clear experience, confessed that he had secured a pension through fraud, and wrote a letter of confession to the Commissioner of Pensions at Washington asking forgiveness. A few days later, he wrote a letter of confession to the insurance company, because he had misrepresented facts in securing a policy.

Others made similar confessions. Aside from the great work done among church members, there were over fifty conversions. A local paper says:

"One of the best evidences of thorough work is the fact that the people stayed away from the altar until the Spirit of God so moved them that they could not rest day or night, when they would yield; break down, weep and cry to God to have mercy on their soul. The type of conviction was so deep that they refused to be comforted until God delivered, when many of them would jump to their feet, clap their hands and shout for joy. Some of the young converts were so moved by the Spirit of God that they went through the congregation, shaking hands with their friends and plead with them in tears to give their hearts to God. And if they could not prevail with them, they would kneel down and pray with them in their seats. Such revivals come only in answer to agonizing prayer, prompted by the Holy Spirit."

The Children's Pulpit

ROBBERS IN A CAVE

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.

WHY did Solomon want you children to be trained up? Because he knew if you were trained up when young you would stand straight up when you are old. The Elbib books are the best ever written for a train-up. Thousands and thousands of people have proven that this text is true. Children have been trained up when they were young; and while some of them bent over a little while growing, they have always come out straight before growing old.

If you boys and girls will read these books by the light the Author sends with them your character will grow straight. Your body and mind may bend over a little, but your character will always straighten them up. When you are men and women you will find the straight character of childhood will keep you straight in manhood and womanhood. You say this sounds like a sermon. Then I shall tell you a story and leave the sermon for some other time.

THERE was a band of highway robbers living in a cave. They would go out and watch the road until some one came along whom they could rob. One evening a wagon passed loaded with books and groceries and clothing and all those other things that made it just like a store on wheels. The robbers killed the owner, turned the horses loose, and carried all that was in the wagon to their cave. Then they took the wagon back into a valley and burned it. That night, as was their custom, they had an auction, and each member of the band of thieves bought the things he wanted that had been stolen from the wagon. They were all drinking and thought they were having a good time.

One of the robbers acted as auctioneer, and he would hold up one of the articles and say: "How much? How much? Do I hear a bid?" During the sale he took up a book that proved to be an Elbib Library. Then he began asking for bids, but no one seemed to want the Library. One of the men said, "Read something from these books and then we shall know whether it is worth buying or not." He read the Twenty-third Psalm. This they thought was a great joke. There was no end of their laughing and jeering, but one of the robbers was quiet. He did not laugh nor speak. He folded his hands, and his head bent over, and the other men thought he was too drunk to enjoy their fun.

BUT this was not the reason. The chapter the man had read was one that this quiet man had committed to memory when he was a boy. He would stand by his mother and recite it to her, and at night she had him kneel by her side to say his evening prayer. When this part of the book was being read by the drunken auctioneer, the quiet man seemed to see his aged father with the open Elbib before him, and to hear his mother teaching him the chapter. Going away from home he had gotten into bad company and had joined this band of robbers. His body and mind had become very crooked. But now, after thirty years, he was a child again as he heard the book read, and was, in thought, with his father and mother in the old home. One of the men went over and struck him on the shoulder and said: "Say, old dreamer, how much will you give for that book? You are more in need of it than any of us, for you are without doubt the greatest sinner of us all." "Yes, that I am. Give me the book. I will pay you its full value."

THE morning dawned and the robbers went to the neighboring village to dispose of the spoil. The purchaser of the Library betook himself to a solitary hiding-place in the rocks. He spent the whole day and the following night in terrible anguish and gnawings of conscience. Every now and then he laid down his Elbib, thinking that the forgiveness of sin could not be granted to him. But as the old light began to burn and he read the Elbib, peace and pardon came into his heart. He went to the minister of the nearest village and told him the story. The minister told him to keep the candle burning and to keep on reading his Elbib, and God would lead him on the right path. He asked the minister to go with him to a judge, and to him he confessed his sins and his crimes.

After ten years' imprisonment he came out and went back to his old home. The other robbers were all captured and severely punished, but their characters had been crooked when they were children, and there was nothing now to straighten them. But the one with the Elbib had been trained up when a child in the way he should go. When in great need his child-training did not depart from him. He never was as happy as he would have been if he had not gotten into bad company and had never joined this band of robbers.

BUT now, in all the rest of his years, he stood straight and upright. Often he would gather the children of his old home town together and would read to them from his Elbib. He knew that if he could get the children straight while they were young they could be straight and happy when they were old.

Now if you will turn to your Elbib and find Proverbs 22: 6, you will read: "Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old, he will not depart from it."

Bide a Wee

THE journey will not end to-day,
For leagues and years may wind the way,
Where gleams the home-light, pilgrim, stay,
And bide a wee.

When gale and blast and tempest blow,
And cold thy heart and icy grow,
Draw near the hearth, the homely glow,
And bide a wee.

When life's sirocco breathes defeat,
And hope declines in desert heat,
Be my oasis thy retreat,
And bide a wee.

And have you heard the luring cry
That seemed a song and proved a sigh?
The hope of home is heaven-high.
Ah, bide a wee!

A Moral Transformation

THREE years ago, a young lady taught five little children under a sycamore tree on the Puncheon Camp in "Bloody Breathitt" County in Kentucky, where there was neither a church nor a school. Two years ago, Governor Willson dedicated the new college under the same sycamore. On Sunday, September 11, Dr. Guerrant dedicated the fifth building in the beautiful campus, a twenty-five-room dormitory for the Highland girls, the gift of a noble woman in Connecticut.

Rev. Joseph M. Evans, the well-known evangelist, who held a meeting there recently, says: "In forty-six years' intimate knowledge of the religious work of Kentucky, the writer has not known so great a transformation in so brief a period as at Herald in Breathitt County, the seat of the Highland College on the Puncheon Camp, founded and conducted by the Soul Winners' Society. Three years ago, without church or school, it was a typical community of what has been described as "Bloody Breathitt." To-day there are five spacious buildings, the joy and pride of the community. There is a church of more than one hundred members, with an efficient pastor, Rev. James P. Doggett.

This is one of some forty missions of the Soul Winners' Society in the Cumberland and Alleghany Mountains. Dr. Edward O. Guerrant, of Wilmore, Ky., is president, Major Robert S. Bullock, of Lexington, Ky., is treasurer, and Mr. James R. Alexander, of Wilmore, Ky., is secretary.

A steel bank car for the transportation of funds and used as a movable pay car is one of the latest novelties in automobiles. All doors and windows are provided with electric alarms and the roof and walls are built of heavy fireproof steel. The interior is a completely equipped banking room with a large safe, desk and cashier's window. Underneath the desk are compartments for keeping books.

The Situation in Cuba To-day

"talk politics," as would be said in the United States, because they are too busy. It is in the larger towns, and especially in Havana, that so much talk is heard of politics. When they have nothing to do, they find fault with the government, either for the way it is managing affairs or because they and all their relatives have not been able to get office. In proportion to the number of inhabitants, Cuba has as many public offices, perhaps more, than any State in the Union with 2,000,000 inhabitants; but, as in the United States, there are not enough to go around, and the discontented office seekers are always talking against the government. They want a change, so that the people in office can be turned out and they and their relatives can get in. This is not always the sole cause of discontent, but it always is one cause, and it should be taken into account when the rumors of trouble ahead for the government in power are thickest.

While much politics is talked in Cuba, it is still like many Latin-American countries in being without any well-defined political parties—that is, parties which exist because of an honest difference of opinion in regard to fundamental questions At the present time the political parties are largely groups of individuals.

Since General José Miguel Gomez became President a good deal of progress has been made, and no harm will come if occasionally something is heard of the political divisions in the Cuban Congress or among the people. The chief thing that interests the United States is that peaceful government in Cuba shall continue under Cuban administration.

The Woman's Golden Jubilee of Missions

A GOLDEN anniversary is the first half century milestone since the organization in 1860 of the Woman's Union Missionary Society in the United States. It was the beginning of woman's organized work for women and children in foreign lands. This celebration is one of the most important religious events of the current year. It heralds a new era of united endeavor by American women for oppressed womanhood and childhood around the globe.

The year 1910-11 also marks the silver jubilee of the institution of United Mission Study among women, which began at the suggestion of Miss Abbie Child, of Boston, at the great New York Ecumenical Missionary Conference in 1900. The central committee of seven on the United Study of Missions—of seven different denominations — led by that indefatigable and devoted leader and former missionary, Mrs. Henry W. Peabody, of Beverly, Mass. (better known as Mrs. Lucy Waterbury), is the moving power in the Golden Jubilee.

The methods followed have been those of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, and the results to be attained are not less important and significant. One million dollars for missions is the goal. The keynote is prayer and co-operation; and chief among the objects worked for is that those who know little of missions, or who are indifferent to them, may, through the Jubilee, get a vision of things as they are and that they may give themselves freely to the work either abroad or at home.

The Jubilee has been going on since October 12, when it was inaugurated in Oakland and San Francisco with cheering success. A thousand women attended, drawing-room meetings were held and a big luncheon was given. In Portland, Ore., a few days later, there were delegates from twelve cities, eight enthusiastic missionary rallies, and ten missionary speakers. Two thousand women were at the mass-meeting in Seattle, Wash.; nine denominations worked together in Omaha, where the city was illuminated for the Jubilee; pageant scenes were introduced and a mass meeting was held for the young people who marched under their denominational banners at Kansas City; there were fine drawing-room meetings and great district rallies in Chicago; St. Louis, Indianapolis, Minneapolis, Milwaukee, Detroit and Denver all held enthusiastic celebrations. The largest amount pledged for missions during the first fourteen celebrations was $85,000 by Indianapolis; Kansas City pledged $50,000; Chicago, $34,000; Cincinnati, $26,000, and Denver, $19,000. About $300,000 was pledged.

The series of celebrations is continued in the Eastern circuit as follows: Cleveland, January 23 and 24; Louisville, January 26 and 27; Nashville, January 30 and 31; Washington, February 2 and 3; Baltimore, February 7 and 8; Harrisburg, February 9 and 10; Philadelphia, February 13 and 14; Pittsburg, February 16 and 17; Buffalo, February 23 and 24; Syracuse, February 27 and 28; Albany and Troy, March 2 and 3; Springfield, March 6 and 7; New Haven, March 8 and 9; Providence, March 10 and 11; Boston, March 14 and 15; Portland, 16, 17.

The great culmination of the Jubilee is scheduled for New York City early in April, when the torches lit at the earlier beacon fires will be brought together in a great blaze of demonstration and spectacle, fed by the life-giving fuel of prayer and consecration.

The most important result of the Golden Jubilee is the impressing upon Christian women of the greatness of their task. The chief factors in this are the revealing motion-pictures showing the dreadful life of oppressed and ignorant women in the Orient; the addresses of the medical missionaries like Dr. Mary Noble; and the speeches and writings of that diligent student of missionary conditions and problems, Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery, of New York, who has also graphically summarized the development of the woman's missionary work at home and abroad.

In 1861 there was a single missionary in the field, Miss Marston, of Burma, and one organized woman's society; now there are 800 teachers, 140 physicians, 380 evangelists, 79 trained nurses, 5,783 Bible women and native helpers, and 44 women's societies with two million supporters, raising an aggregate of over four million dollars in 1910. Among the 2,100 schools, there are 260 boarding and high schools; there are 75 hospitals and 78 dispensaries. In addition to carrying on these large tasks the women's missionary organizations have built colleges, hospitals, dispensaries, nurses' homes, orphanages, leper asylums, homes for missionaries' children, training schools, and industrial plants; set up printing presses, translated Bibles, tracts and school books; built boats and founded newspapers; published missionary magazines, distributed mite boxes, printed millions of lesson leaflets, study outlines, programmes and booklets; maintained offices, State and national organizations, yearly and triennial conventions, and organized a fine network of unpaid helpers.

"It is an achievement of which women may well be proud," she declares, adding, "But let us never think we are meeting the need of the heathen world; we are only touching its edges. What are 140 physicians among a half billion women? What are 2,100 schools to the 250 million children who ought to be in school? . . . The women of the Protestant churches of the United States number at least twelve millions. Of these it may be doubted whether we have enlisted in support of foreign missionary work one-fourth. . . . So long as our national bill for chewing gum exceeds our gifts to foreign missions and our ostrich feather and candy outputs could float the missionary benevolences like skiffs on a river, we need not fear impoverishing the churches by too much importunity."

Real Head of the Postal Banks

OUR new year 1911 is rather young to have much of achievement to its credit, but it is reasonably safe to predict that few of the movements that may be inaugurated during the current twelvemonth will be more important or have more universal significance for the whole American people than the Postal Savings Bank, which has lately come into being. At yet only a limited section of the community—one town in each State—has had the new governmental incentive to saving brought to its door; but the encouraging circumstance is that a beginning has been made, and doubtless the institution will be rapidly extended throughout the whole country, as in case of Rural Free Delivery after that system was set in motion.

As most of our readers are aware, there has long been public agitation for a Postal Savings Bank. Various foreign nations have long successfully maintained banking systems for small savings in conjunction with their postal services. Indeed, one of the arguments for the establishment of such an institution in the United States has been that a very large section of our foreign population, having been educated in their native lands to rely upon governmental safeguarding of their savings, and finding no such facilities in this country, have been sending their hoardings abroad, thus diverting to alien financial institutions much of the money that ought to remain in circulation in the United States.

If Uncle Sam has been a trifle tardy in launching a governmental savings system as a "side line" of his greatest business institution—the United States Post Office—perhaps we should feel compensated for the delay, because the officials in charge declare that the plan of operation which has been devised is much superior to that in vogue in any European country. One point of difference in which the advantage is said to be all on the side of the American system is, that each depositor gets a neat certificate of deposit as a record and tangible evidence of his deposit instead of the bulky pass book required in European countries.

Another advantage of the certificate of deposit plan which indirectly affects each depositor is that it does away with the possibility of theft or embezzlement through the falsifying of accounts by any teller or clerk who may have the handling of the money. No depositor can lose a cent of his hard-earned money. That is one of the benefits of the new institution. The national government will stand behind every postal savings bank deposit just as it does behind every other one of its obligations, from a $1 silver certificate to a $10,000 gold bond. Indeed, it is this governmental guarantee back of it that is causing the new Postal Savings Bank to prove a boon to many people who have never had much confidence in ordinary savings banks.

The new postal institution has been aptly nicknamed the "poor man's bank," because it has been specially created for the great mass of our population who must save a little at a time. The law provides that no one depositor shall deposit more than $100 in any one month, and that no depositor shall draw interest on more than $500 in one year. On the other hand, every effort is being made to encourage saving. One special purpose of the new country-wide bank is to encourage saving among children. A bank account may be opened for as small a sum as ten cents, and when the system is in full operation, a year or more hence, an account may be opened at any post office, great or small, in the United States, and every rural mail-carrier will also be a receiving teller for the bank. Thus it will not be necessary actually to go to the bank; the bank will come to you.

The small deposits under one dollar are made by means of special ten-cent stamps (very like postage stamps in size and general appearance), which are pasted as purchased on a card furnished for the purpose by the postal authorities. Such a card, when its ten blank spaces have been filled with stamps, making a total of one dollar, is exchanged at the post office for a certificate of deposit. When one dollar or more is deposited at one time, no stamps are used, but a certificate of deposit is issued direct. Each certificate is issued in duplicate. The depositor gets one copy as his receipt and the government keeps the other copy as a record. For the time being the postmasters who are acting as officials of the Postal Savings Bank are making out the certificates of deposit by hand. Ultimately the government hopes to install at each post office a new type of machine, somewhat on the principle of a cash register, which will perform automatically the whole operation of making out and recording each certificate—providing yet another safeguard against theft and dishonesty.

Every Rural Mail-Carrier Will Be a Receiving Teller

Printing Postal Savings Bank Stamps

When a person has put money in the Postal Savings Bank he may leave it there with no attention on his part as long as he likes and it will go on earning money for him at the rate of two cents a year on each dollar. The certificates of deposit are so planned that when they are presented any postmaster or indeed any private citizen who is good at figures can tell very quickly how much interest is due, thus dodging the long delays for bookkeeping that have sometimes been encountered in private banks. The certificates of deposit will be non-transferable and non-negotiable; no one but a depositor himself can draw his money, and he must be positively identified when he goes to take out his money or any part of it. A depositor, when he has on deposit $20, $40, $60, $80, $100 or $500, may exchange his certificates of deposit for a Postal Savings Bank Bond, the principal advantage of which is that it draws interest at 2½ per cent. per year instead of 2 per cent.—a gain of 50 cents a year on $100.

The management of the new Postal Savings Bank is in the hands of a Board of Trustees composed of Postmaster General Hitchcock, Attorney-General Wickersham and Secretary of the Treasury MacVeagh, with an energetic Secretary to the Board in the person of Theodore L. Weed, who has borne the brunt of the responsibility for putting in actual operation the wheels of the new scheme. Under the supervision of Director Ralph there have been produced at the United States Bureau of Engraving and Printing the Postal Savings Bank Bonds above mentioned, and they are decidedly handsome, being adorned with portraits of Presidents Washington, Lincoln and Cleveland. Director Ralph has also produced at his novel printery millions of special new stamps which will be used as receipts for deposits amounting to less than one dollar.

GENERAL NOTES

—MRS. MARY BAKER EDDY'S gift of $2,000,000 to the Christian Science Church of Concord, N. H., seems destined to be void. There is a statute in New Hampshire which prohibits a bequest to a church of more than $5,000 a year. This is the only State in which such a prohibition exists.

—THERE WERE 14,820,200 head of live stock shipped into Chicago during 1910, an increase of 141,000 cattle, 90,000 calves and 792,000 sheep, but a decrease of 617,700 hogs and 82,000 horses compared with the previous year. It took 256,700 cars to haul the livestock, which was valued at $350,000,000.

—THE CZARINA of Russia is again reported to be critically ill. She is said to have developed partial paralysis of the lower limbs, as the result of long continued nervous strain. She is constantly in dread for the safety of her oldest son, the Czarevitch, who has to be taken to her room many times daily, that she may be satisfied that he is safe and well.

—A NEW GUN, the use of which may mean the revolutionizing of the most modern methods of war on land, and which for lightness, power and general effectiveness is said to be the most terribly destructive weapon ever invented, is now being manufactured at the arsenal in Springfield, Mass. This gun, weighing less than twenty pounds, and manipulated after the fashion of an ordinary fowling-piece, when in action, will pour out a stream of bullets at the rate of 400 shots a minute!

The Senate and Arbitration

IT IS gratifying to note that the London Times—the Thunderer of European politics—has for the moment turned its attention from predictions of war between England and the Continental powers, and is seriously discussing peace probabilities. This is as it should be. Lord Northcliffe, who controls some thirty publications, many of them daily newspapers, may yet be disposed to accept THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S suggestion and wheel his forces to the side of peace and arbitration. In a recent issue, the Times, discussing President Taft's suggestion in his annual message looking to arbitration treaty negotiations, says that such negotiations would be welcomed in Great Britain, and adds: "If the President is able to overcome the Senate's objections, he may rely upon the favorable reception here of any concrete proposals."

There is no good reason to anticipate substantial objection by the Senate to the arbitration programme outlined in the President's message and elaborated by Hon. Philander C. Knox, Secretary of State. Were it a question of "entangling alliances," with conditions and restrictions that might prove embarrassing even in the slightest degree in our future diplomacy; or if it involved any pledge or compact of an offensive or defensive character, then there might be reasonable grounds for objection. Our invariable policy, from the foundation of this government up to the present time, has been to avoid such alliances. In the present case, however, the proposal is simply, as Secretary Knox has shown, to agree to refer to arbitration all future questions of importance arising between the two nations. Such a treaty could only result in the avoidance of friction and the increase of good feeling between the two countries. It would be welcomed in Canada no less, we believe, than in England; moreover, it would be the sane and reasonable way of settling all our disputes hereafter. In these days of peace progress on all lines, our Senators will doubtless show themselves appreciative of the growing public sentiment in favor of arbitration. It is the hope not only of ardent peace-lovers, but of every sensible citizen, that, some day in the early future, we may have to chronicle the conclusion of a treaty embracing all the great powers, and which will establish arbitration instead of arms as the future resort in every difference of consequence that may arise between governments. There can be no lessening of prestige by an international compact for honorable peace. The governments that come to the front in such a movement, and persevere until they carry it through successfully, will distinguish themselves beyond all their predecessors in the value of the service they render to the world and to humanity.

It may be that, in God's great wisdom, now is the opportune time for the great change. We trust that the United States Senate will do its share to aid in securing for this government the well-earned fame it will deserve for having taken the initiative in a step of such momentous importance and so full of promise.

The Bank Flurry in New York

WITH the failure of the Carnegie Trust Company of New York City, which occurred January 7, New York passed through what has been called a bank flurry, which early in the proceedings promised to become of some consequence. The failure of the Carnegie Trust Company itself was of consequence by virtue of the fact that not only did the failure amount to several million dollars, but much of this money belonged to the city and State governments. The failure occurred on Saturday, and by Monday its moral effect began to operate on the emotions of a large number of depositors in some of the smaller banks, in consequence of which more or less protracted runs were made upon these institutions. Among the saner and larger business interests of the city, however, the defunct Trust Company had for a long time been regarded with suspicion, and for that reason its failure was discounted in advance, as far as its effects upon these larger interests were concerned. The financial powers that be in New York anticipated the runs on these smaller banks, and arranged to have plenty of cash on hand to meet any contingency. As soon as the people found that they could withdraw their money, they at once regained confidence and, in a large majority of cases, redeposited their money in the banks. After all, it was but a momentary flurry, due to the collapse of the Carnegie Trust Company. Many people thought that Mr. Carnegie was interested in the Trust Company which bore his name. As a matter of fact, he was not, and objected greatly to the use of the name Carnegie in connection with the institution. He tried to prevent its use at one time, but as the official powers at Albany ruled that he was not the only Carnegie, he was unable to prohibit the use of his name.

The State Bank Inspector gave confidence to depositors by issuing a statement declaring substantially that the few failures had been discounted, and that no other bank was under suspicion and no further trouble was anticipated.

Our "Home Church" Discussion

IN THE very large number of letters that have come to us in response to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S invitation to a free and helpful discussion of existing church conditions, we recognize the general deep desire for spiritual improvement. In the mass of correspondence received (part of which we print on another page) many denominations are represented. There are letters from members of weak churches and strong churches; from churches that are keeping the spiritual fires burning brightly and whose consecrated workers are real soul-winners, and from others that are in grave danger from worldliness, love of pleasure and spiritual indifference. Truly, the ancient apostolic warnings to the early churches would not seem to be altogether out of place in many localities to-day.

We would urge our readers and God's people everywhere, who sincerely desire the spread of the Gospel and the upbuilding of the Christian Church, to take this great question to heart and do what lies in their power to help toward a solution. It is a problem for old and young, for the Christian veteran, as well as for the youthful, ardent convert. Let all read the instructive series of letters in this issue and apply the lesson they convey. They show that the prime causes of progressive church decay, where it exists, are indifference, unbelief, love of wealth and display, devotion to social pleasures, the drink traffic, and the neglect of the great command to send the Gospel to all the world. These, when they once gain a foothold in any church, eat like a canker. Their growth is synonymous with declining attendance and ultimately they produce spiritual apathy. But there are, on the other hand—and we thank God for it!—many, many churches that are ever facing heavenward and where consecrated hearts and hands are doing the Lord's work joyously and grandly. Little churches, as well as big ones, are the scenes of Gospel triumphs. It is seen that a little garden, well tilled, is better than a great orchard neglected and run to waste and weeds.

Especially instructive and helpful are the letters from old members—men and women who have grown gray in the Master's service—and who can look upon the existing situation with wider spiritual vision. Some of these write in sorrow, but more in hope. As a whole, church conditions, as they unfold themselves in these letters, are encouraging. As others are published, the general view will become more and more interesting. We repeat the invitation to our readers, who have not yet contributed their own church experiences, to do so. Every church has a story of its own that will not only benefit itself in the telling, but will carry a helpful lesson to other churches.

The Land of Opportunity

IT IS a mighty stride from laborer in a wire mill, at $4.65 a week, to the presidency of the United States Steel Corporation at $100,000 a year. The man who has accomplished it is James A. Farrell, who was elected the other day to succeed William Ellis Corey. In his career, Mr. Farrell has given another proof that ours is still the land of opportunity for the poor boy with grit and determination to succeed—the boy who has a cool head and an honest heart and is not afraid to soil his hands at honest work, no matter how humble. Some thirty years ago, Farrell commenced life as a wire-puddler in New Haven. He stuck at the job for years until his devotion to duty was recognized. He came under the notice of Charles M. Schwab and was sent to the Pittsburg Wire Company. He soon became superintendent, then manager, and after six years left to become general superintendent of the Oliver Steel Wire Company at Beaver Falls, Pa. In 1903 he was asked to come to New York to organize the United States Steel Products Export Company. He became president of the concern, and J. P. Morgan and others quickly perceived that he was the man to take Corey's place. Mr. Farrell is, comparatively speaking, a young man, being yet on the sunny side of fifty.

Famine's Deadly Work in China

CHINA'S famine is spreading. The latest cable advices from Peking state that a thousand people are dying daily of starvation and famine fever in the three afflicted provinces. There is every likelihood that conditions will become worse during the next three months. The imperial government, although doing its best to help the sufferers, finds itself, as in the last famine, unable to halt the migrating multitudes in the flooded sections from which they are flocking to the cities, leaving lines of dead strewn along the highways. Relief committees at Shanghai and Chinkiang are doing good work, but with very limited means. Our Missionary Committee at the latter city—which did splendid service in the last famine—is again in the field. To this Committee all contributions sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for famine relief are forwarded. If you have not yet sent in your mite to the Relief Fund, send it to-day. Every gift may be the means of saving a human life.

The cover page of our December 28 issue, "An Evening Song," has been so favorably received by our readers, that we take pleasure in announcing that we can supply this picture in colors, at the price of TEN CENTS, including postage. The picture will be sent in a tube to insure delivery in good condition.

—A DEVICE FOR saving the horse on slippery streets and roads has just been put on the market in Chicago, and has given satisfaction wherever tested. It is an overshoe, which is made with four space chains strapped on over the ordinary horseshoe and ingeniously fastened across the bottom of the hoof. Cutting into the snow or ice, the chains prevent the slipping of the animal. The shoes are slipped only over the forefeet and can be adjusted in a few seconds.

A Detachment of Insurgents Fighting Federal Troops at Mal Paso, Mexico

The Mexican Rebellion

THE revolt against the Diaz government in Mexico is still in progress. It began about two months ago with a fight in the city of Puebla, in which more than a hundred persons were killed. Francisco I. Madero, who proclaimed himself provisional president on November 23, seems at present to be in hiding, and the active work of the campaign is directed by General Orozco. It is reported that the reason of General Madero's inactivity is that he was wounded in the battle near Ciudad Porfirio Diaz soon after his claim to the presidency. The rebels were reported gathering in Zapata County, Texas, and government troops were rushed to intercept them. Governor Campbell despatched a company of rangers to that county to prevent the departure of a war expedition. The Mexican Government realizes the danger of a revolution. When police and troops of Puebla made a raid on the house of Aquiles Cerdon, leader of a little band of revolutionists, they met with determined resistance and twenty-five policemen and seventy-five others were killed. Within five days there was an uprising in twenty-four cities and towns. Small forces of rebels and government troops fought at Coahuila, around Torreon and at Santa Isabel. General Navarro was surrounded in Pedernales and a fierce battle ensued. Early in December the rebels took possession of a little cut near Mal Paso, waylaying the federal soldiers and capturing several pieces of field artillery, but a reinforcement of government troops compelled the rebels to evacuate Mal Paso on the last day of the year. At present the rebels are forced into Sonora, and it looks as though the end of the rebellion was not very far away. President Diaz, dissatisfied with the inefficiency of his army, called for the resignation of General Don Manuel Gonzales Cozio, Minister of War, who is now eighty years old and who has spent fifty years in the service of his country. The President intimated that the rebellion would have been crushed instantly if a young competent officer had been at the head of the army. General Cozio cheerfully resigns his honor and task to a younger man. It is reported that Señor Limantour, Minister of Finance, will resign, and that Señor Enrique Creel will take his place. Señor De La Barra, Mexican Minister to the United States, has been offered the portfolio of Foreign Affairs and will go to Mexico shortly to give the President his answer. President Diaz, in his ability and his official administration, is one of the most remarkable men in the world. It is not an unusual thing to see revolts in various provinces and districts of even a well-governed country. Order will be speedily restored in the revolutionary districts of Mexico and the nation will have continued peace and prosperity.

A wise king scattereth the wicked, and bringeth the wheel over them. (Prov. 20:26.)

Our Government a Peacemaker

There is good reason to believe that the United States Government will again succeed as a peacemaker, and that the threatened war between Peru and Ecuador will for the second time within a year be averted. The governments of Argentina, Brazil, and the United States on December 29 presented through their representatives at Lima and Quito a recommendation that the governments of Ecuador and Peru now submit for arbitration at The Hague the boundary dispute which has existed between the two republics for many years. The action of the State Department is considered timely by those who are familiar with the situation, and though the United States takes the leadership in the peace negotiations, Argentina and Brazil also deserve full credit for the part they have taken in the proceedings, and it is to be hoped that permanent peace will be secured. For peacemakers among nations as well as with individuals there is a blessing promised:

Blessed are the peacemakers; for they shall be called the children of God. (Matt. 5:9.)

New Multiplex Telephone

General Allen, chief of the Signal Corps of the United States Army, has just announced a new invention of the telephone, by which several independent conversations may be carried on simultaneously on a single wire. This discovery was predicted thirty-five years ago by Thomas A. Edison. It is the invention of Major George O. Squires, Assistant Chief Signal Officer of the United States Army. It is stated that by the new scheme at least four people can talk on the same single telephone wire at once without mutual interference. Positive proof of the practicability of the invention was furnished when two independent telephone conversations were carried on over a single wire which runs from the Laboratory of the Signal Corps of the Bureau of Standards and the Signal Corps Construction Laboratory in Washington. It is claimed that the American Telephone and Telegraph Company could save two million dollars a year by this new discovery, and that there are wires enough now strung in America to last fifty years. There are two remarkable things about this invention worthy of special mention. The first is that it can be used as an attachment, with little or no extra expense, to the ordinary telephone in use; and the other is that it is to be given to the people of the United States entirely free, without a penny of royalty or other expense attached to the use of the system. The inventor is a brilliant and worthy officer of the United States service, and has thus without money and without price bestowed a blessing of an untold value to the people of his country. Christ, the most precious gift to the world, is free. The prophet makes this reference to the gift:

Ho, every one that thirsteth . . . that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price. (Isa. 55:1.)

Swift Justice Administered

James J. Gallagher, who came so near killing Mayor Gaynor of New York, also shot Commissioner of Street Cleaning, "Big Bill" Edwards, in the arm, as the latter prevented the assassin from sending another bullet into the body of the Mayor. For this the prisoner was tried in Justice Swayze's Court in Jersey City and sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment. He sobbed like a child, saying, "Now I'll die in prison." The swiftness of Jersey justice is measured by the important things crowded into the time between 10 o'clock A.M. and 3.50 P.M. of the same day. The events are as follows: 10 o'clock—Court opened. 10.12—Entire jury chosen. 10.15—Jury sworn in. 10.16—Assistant Prosecutor Vickers began address. 10.31—Herman Greif sworn as first witness. 10.45—State closed its case and recess was declared. 2.20—Court reopened. 2.21—Counsel for Gallagher announced no witnesses would be called for the defense. 2.36—Counsel for Gallagher finished appeal to jury. 2.37—Mr. Vickers began to sum up for the State. 2.51—Court began charge to jury. 3.11—The jury retired. 3.28—Jury returned for further instructions. 3.35—Verdict returned. 3.40—Court sentenced Gallagher to twelve years in prison. 3.45—Gallagher taken back to jail. 3.50—Court cleared. The needless delay of the courts in this country has not been favorable to the suppression of crime, and the swift punishment of the prisoner in Jersey City will be a wholesome example and a deterrent. The value of the swift execution of the law is suggested in the following words:

And whosoever will not do the law of thy God, and the law of the king, let judgment be executed speedily upon him, whether it be unto death, or to banishment, or to confiscation of goods, or to imprisonment. (Ezra 7:26.)

A New Strawberry

By a telegram from Santa Rosa, Calif., it is learned that Mr. Burbank has just perfected the growth of a strawberry of a new type, which he calls the Patagonia. The world-famed gardener says this is the first of a new race which has come to make strawberry growers rejoice. The berries are uniformly large, weighing sometimes as much as an ounce, and are of a fine scarlet color. The seeds are so small as to be almost imperceptible. The fruit melts easily in the mouth. Mr. Burbank's discoveries and achievements in the realm of scientific gardening have been the wonder and pride of the world, and society will be grateful to him for this last discovery in his especial field. This mastery over nature reminds us of that which God entrusted to man at the beginning.

And the Lord God took man and put him into the Garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it. (Gen. 2:15.)

Four Babies Born

Santa Claus and the stork came to the home of Mr. and Mrs. John Cortwright, near Dunellen, N. J., and left a basket of babies. The combined weight of the four was twelve pounds. They all appear to be strong and healthy, and the mother is said to be doing well. The father said to a reporter: "I don't know of any joy keener than that of being a father, but to have the happiness come fourfold is what I might call bewildering." Mr. and Mrs. Cortwright are each twenty-four years of age and celebrated the first anniversary of their wedding last Thanksgiving Day. The birth of so many babies at one time produced a great sensation in the neighborhood, and gifts poured in and offers of help and nurses came from every direction. Among the gifts sent to the infants are two little cribs and a pair of baby carriages, each capable of holding four infants, besides rattles, blankets, underwear, etc. Fortunately Mr. and Mrs. Cortwright have a farm and will be able to provide for the support of the large family which is promised. It is said that the census indicates that the increase in the population of this neighborhood is not as rapid as in other parts of the county, and it is said that there is some local pride as well as surprise at the numerical increase. It is to be hoped that the dear little ones that God has given these servants of his may be spared in health and strength and that the parents may live to train them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. The advent of these cherubs suggests the promise of the Psalmist:

Thy wife shall be as a fruitful vine by the sides of thine house; thy children like olive plants round about thy table. (Ps. 128:3.)

The Gideons' Greatest Field Day

WHILE the hours preceding New Year's Eve found thousands of people in Chicago preparing for a night of feasting and revelry, it likewise found a band of earnest men preparing to place within the reach of hundreds of thousands of their fellows the Book which, above all other books ever written, has been the teacher of temperance and self-restraint; the comfort to the perplexed and the sorrowing; a tower of defense from the fierce onsets of sin, and the sword of the Spirit in hewing down every enemy of righteousness, personal, municipal and national.

The Gideons Setting Out on Their Work of Bible Distribution in Chicago Hotels

These stout-hearted men were Gideons, aided by some of Chicago's most eminent ministers. The work they did was to place six thousand Bibles in the hotels of Chicago. It was a simple act; but it came as the result of long and prayerful planning on the part of W. E. Henderson, national secretary of the Gideons, and co-operation of his helpers and the proprietors of the hotels, who kindly accepted the proffered gifts, and promised to keep the Bibles within reach of their guests.

The service preceding the march to the hotels was held in the auditorium of the Young Men's Christian Association and was a most impressive one. The Bibles were arranged in piles on the platform, each pile having a placard, stating the number of the Bibles in the heap and the hotel for which they were designed. The LaSalle Hotel pyramid contained an even 1,000 Bibles, and being the largest one, occupied the centre of the stage. The other hotels represented were the Palmer House, 635 Bibles; Congress, 600 Bibles; Auditorium, 365 Bibles; Great Northern, 400 Bibles; Grand Pacific, 200 Bibles, and so on through the list, making a total of 6,000. Only two hotels refused to allow the Bibles an entrance.

After a series of stirring addresses and Gospel songs, each man took one or two bundles of Bibles, six Bibles to the bundle, and led by Mr. Henderson and some of the ministers and surrounded by a group of Gideons, marched to the LaSalle Hotel, one block away, and made the first distribution. The men then returned to the Young Men's Christian Association and continued the march to the various hotels until all had been supplied.

Marion Laurance, General Secretary of the International Sunday School Association, was one of the speakers. He stated that he himself is a Gideon, having for his number 1,196. He related the story of the origin of the Gideon organization. Samuel E. Hill, of Beloit, Wis., one of the two men into whose hearts in 1899 the God-inspired thought of forming a Christian organization among traveling men first came, was present and was presented to the audience. Mr. Laurance told how J. H. Nicholson, also of Beloit, who was the other traveling man associated with Mr. Hill, and Mr. J. W. Knight, of Wild Rose, Wis., who was later added to the two originators, knelt in prayer and asked God to give them a name for their proposed organization. While praying, the name "Gideon" came into the mind of Mr. Nicholson. It met the instant approval of his companions and was adopted. At the first convention of the Gideons in the fall of that year there were 37 members. In one year there were 600. Now there are 8,000 members. "And now," said Mr. Laurance, "I do not know who are Gideons in this audience, but I do know that when I repeat the words of Judges 7: 21, every man among them will be on his feet. He then quoted the words of the Scripture verse: "And they stood every man in his place." Instantly, from all parts of the house, the Gideons sprang to their feet and a shout of victory was raised!

Other speakers at the preliminary meeting were Rev. Dr. John Balcom Shaw, Second Presbyterian church; Rev. Dr. Johnston Meyers, Immanuel Baptist church; Rev. Dr. Charles Bayard Mitchell, St. James Methodist Episcopal church; Rev. Dr. John Timothy Stone, Fourth Presbyterian church; Dr. Shailer Mathews, dean Divinity School, University of Chicago, and Bishop Charles Edward Cheney, Christ Church, Reformed Episcopal. It was a notable array of progressive, practical and talented leaders in the evangelical pulpits of Chicago. Each speaker gave hearty commendation to the movement and high praise of the value of the circulation of the Word of God.

Each Bible placed in the hotels has printed on the first inside cover suggestions of such a striking character that they cannot fail to attract attention, and will without doubt cause many a traveling man alone with his thoughts to realize that he is after all alone with God:

If lonesome or blue or friends untrue, read Ps. 23 and 27, and Luke 15.
If trade is poor, read Ps. 37; John 15.
If discouraged or in trouble, read Ps. 126; John 14.
If you are all out of sorts, read Heb. 12.
If you are losing confidence in men, read I. Cor. 13.
If skeptical, read John 6: 40; 7: 17; Phil. 2: 9-11.
If you can't have your own way, read James 3.
If tired of sin, read Luke 18: 35-43; 18: 9-14; John 9.
If very prosperous, read I. Cor. 10: 12, 13.

OUR LATEST BATTLESHIP

THE battleship Arkansas, the latest Dreadnought to be added to Uncle Sam's war fleet of fighting monsters, was launched from the yards of the New York Shipbuilding Company at Camden, N. J., on January 14.

In the construction of these vessels each launch shows an increase in dimension, tonnage and horsepower, and also an addition to the armament. The principal dimensions of the Arkansas are: Length on load water line, 554 feet; length over all, 562 feet; beam over armor, 93 feet, 2⅝ inches; trial draught, 28 feet, 6 inches; trial displacement, 26,000 tons; trial speed, 20½ knots an hour generated by Parsons turbine engines.

The main armament consists of twelve 12-inch breech-loading guns, mounted in six turrets on the centre line of the ship, two forward, two aft and two amidships. These turrets, which are protected by armor twelve inches thick, are supplied with ammunition from the magazine and shell rooms below by means of electrical hoists. The guns will be manipulated and handled solely by electricity.

Besides the equipment of general armament guns the Arkansas is provided with a defense against torpedo boat attacks, in the way of a battery of twenty-one five-inch rapid-fire guns, protected by armor of medium thickness. There are two submerged torpedo tubes and ten small guns for boat service and saluting purposes. The total weight of a broadside fire will be about 11,000 pounds. In fact, a single discharge from this modern war leviathan will equal in weight the combined shot sent from all the guns of Dewey's fleet at the engagement of Manila Bay. This will give an indication of the marvelous progress in construction within the past dozen years.

The laying down of a Dreadnought, such as the one just launched, was undreamt of at the beginning of this period. The first of the kind was constructed in England in 1905. It was not until 1907 that the United States essayed to build vessels of this class. That year the Delaware and North Dakota, each of 20,000 tons, were floated; they have a draught of 26 feet, 11 inches. The Delaware has reciprocating engines, and can make a speed of 21 knots an hour. The North Dakota has Curtis turbine engines and a similar speed. The Florida and the Utah, now in course of construction, will each have a displacement of 21,875 tons, and a horsepower of 28,000. Both will be furnished with Parsons turbine engines, generating a speed of over 21 knots an hour. The sister ship of the Arkansas will be the Wyoming, which though developing only the same horse-power will have a displacement of 26,000 tons. Two others to be named the New York and the Texas have been projected.

Our New Dreadnought, the Battleship Arkansas

These United States warships will not be the largest afloat. At the present time America is building for the Argentine government a vessel which will be a thousand tons larger than the Arkansas, and one still larger is being constructed by Brazil.

Despite the great strength put into these vessels in the way of steel and armor plate their life is but short, about ten years or so, even in time of peace. Of course in case of war the broadsides and cannonading would wear them out much sooner.

This may cause some wonder when it is noted that the ship just launched, the Arkansas, has a main belt of armor eight feet wide and an average of ten inches thick, that above this is another belt also ten inches average thickness, and that still higher amidships is the casemate armor protecting the secondary battle and funnel bases. At the ends of the main belt are transverse armor bulkheads. Each barbette is of armor, varying from four inches to eleven inches in thickness, which protects the entire ammunition-handling machinery for the 12-inch guns in the turret above. A strong protective deck extends fore and aft.

The Arkansas is fitted out for a flagship, and will have a complement of 1,030 men and 85 officers. The cost of the ship was about $5,000,000.

Thousands Dying of Famine in China

Starvation and Fever Carrying Off Multitudes of Victims—The U. S. Minister Appeals for the Sufferers

A Little Famine Waif

CABLE dispatches from China bring the depressing news that the famine in Anhui and Kiangsi is spreading and that a thousand victims are dying daily. Dead bodies line the roadsides along which the great bands of peasant sufferers have marched, in the vain hope of getting relief from the dwellers in the cities. The United States Minister in Peking, Hon. William J. Calhoun, expresses the hope that the generous-hearted American people will send prompt aid to relieve the suffering, as they id in the great famine of 1906 when their gifts hrough THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were the means of aving thousands of lives.

Reports show that upwards of five million men, omen and children, if not in actual want in Anhui rovince at the present moment, are on the border f starvation and their case is growing worse every ay. If supplies do not reach them quickly, the ortality will be great. Govern- ent relief is insufficient to meet the nergency. The Imperial exchequer never well supplied. China is a oor country, and when a famine mes, the poverty quickly becomes tensified. On these terrible visi- tions of famine, China must look the outside world for assistance. o save her people at such times, e lays aside her prejudices and r superstitions and appeals to the hristian nations. This is the sit- ation to-day.

"The government at Peking," ys one reliable informant to THE HRISTIAN HERALD, "has sent com- issioners to investigate the famine. hese officers have verified first re- orts. The missionaries, too, have nfirmed the tidings of the situa- on, which is one of increasing avity. The worst flood occurred tween the eighth and ninth moon the Chinese year (that is, about e end of November and beginning December). This was followed a tremendous rainfall, which led the smaller rivers, tributaries the Yang-tse, until they over- owed their banks and inundated e country, almost totally destroy- g the crops. From the inland stricts great swarms of panic- ricken people hurried to Chin- ang, Soo-chow, Yang-chow and Sheong to escape ath by drowning. In Anhui province, most of e ground is low-lying. It has suffered much in e past from similar disasters. The staple cereal hon which the people depend is wheat. When the heat crop fails or is destroyed, as in the present instance, there is sure to be a famine.

Ev the Wayside

"Our people cling to the traditions of their ancestors and follow the same primitive customs and observances. Progress has penetrated but little into our ancient land. Of the other crops adapted to the soil, such as barley, maize, millet, peas and beans, very little is sown. Rice is not cultivated in this province at all. We have but few animals, the goat being the principal; but only the better class of people in good times can afford the luxury of flesh meat. Such is unknown to the palate of the Chinese poor. Very little food suffices them; they are accustomed to a few handfuls of wheat meal a day in the form of porridge or kneaded into hard bread. Now that the wheat lands have been submerged and the crop practically destroyed they are obliged to depend on wild berries and fruits until relief comes to tide them over the present misfortune and enable them to secure seed for next season.

"Floods have ever been the curse of China; they have been always fraught with death and destruction. The country is cut up into innumerable sections by artificial waterways, dykes and canals, besides which there is an immense river system with the great basin of the Yang-tse-kiang as a centre. The Chinese have tried to curb the course of the rivers, but their attempts have been weak, there being few skilled engineers among them."

Chinkiang, which is a missionary headquarters and a centre of relief operations, is a city with a population at normal times of almost a million; but at present, owing to the influx of sufferers from inland districts, this number is greatly increased. It is situated on the Grand Canal not far from the city of Nanking. It was the centre of relief work during the great famine of 1906-7, and it was here that the cargoes of the relief ships Buford and Logan, contributed by CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, were unloaded and sent to the many points of suffering inland.

From various sources, details of the condition of affairs in the famine provinces are gradually coming to hand. These fully confirm the recent reports printed in this journal of the extent and severity of the famine.

Refugees Waiting for Official Relief (as in the Last Great Famine, when Hundreds of Thousands were Domiciled in Outdoor Camps)

Probably the section in which the suffering is most severe is the northern part of the province of Anhui, north and east of the Kwai and Kwo Rivers. This is a territory of some 7,000 square miles, with a population aggregating 2,500,000. Here the direct cause of the famine was the destruction of fall crops through floods, resulting from the heaviest summer rainfalls on record. Famine conditions have prevailed here for the last four months. Thousands of refugees have left the district, but many, being unsuccessful in seeking support elsewhere, are returning, preferring to die in their native place. It is estimated that a million people, chiefly hard-working farmers, will be dependent upon charity for their existence until the spring crops. As early as September, robber bands, desperate at the prospect of starvation, and some of them well armed, traveled through the country, pillaging, terrorizing and killing. Serious trouble was only avoided by the bringing in of troops over the new Tientsin-Pukou Railroad. There were many summary executions of robbers in the yamens or government compounds.

A Scanty Meal

A rainfall of twenty-three inches fell in twenty-four hours at one time of the rainy season, causing heavy floods which swept away scores of villages. Large numbers of the people are reported to have been drowned. A railroad bridge is said to have been choked up with bodies and débris. Some of the highest places, untouched in ordinary floods, were from one to three feet under water.

The people are left so poor that they are able to plant only one-third or one-half of the usual amount of wheat sown. It will take several years for this region to recover from its heavy losses. Some aid has been rendered by the government, but it is inadequate to save life and avert suffering to any material extent. The people and the gentry are desirous of foreign aid, and Chinese and foreign relief committees have been organized. The missionaries are working heroically and doing all that lies in their power to relieve the distress.

Responses to our appeal in behalf of China's famine sufferers are now being received from all parts of the country, showing the widespread interest in this benevolent movement. Many of the letters contain earnest prayers that the suffering may soon be ended. "I wish I could multiply my gift tenfold," writes Mrs. W. C. S., of New Haven, Vt., who sends $1. An old reader in Kent, O., who sends a similar sum, writes: "It is just a little, but the ocean is made of drops. May God's blessing go with it!" T. R. J., Greers, S. C. ($2), says: "May this be the means of saving some lives." Two Harrisburg, Pa., ladies send $4, adding: "We wish to do what we can to help the suffering ones out there."

All contributions sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the China Famine Fund will be cabled to our missionaries at Chinkiang, for distribution in the famine provinces.

HOW IS YOUR OWN CHURCH?

A Helpful Discussion in Which All Church Members Are Invited to Take Part

THAT THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S proposition for a full and free discussion of actual church conditions, in all the denominations, was timely and acceptable, is evident from the very large number of letters that have been received, only a part of which we can give in the present issue. Our invitation, which appeared in the January 4 number, proposed a frank discussion of present church conditions as to (1) loss or gain in membership, (2) sound Gospel preaching, (3) spiritual progress or the reverse, (4) the probable causes of any marked change, (5) work among the children, and (6) revival refreshing. The letters given below constitute the first instalment of many others to follow:

A Spiritually Lethargic Church

I reside in a small country town and am a member of the Baptist church. This is a place where it is generally considered that religion is on the decline. The people who are church members and interested in spiritual things are in the minority. The churches (of which there are several) are run and supported mostly by women. In my own church, out of thirty resident members, only four are men. Very few men are found among the congregations of any church in the town. The majority of people are indifferent as regards the spiritual welfare of the place. Some will say there are too many churches for the size of our town, but there are people enough to fill the churches, were they so inclined.

Two weeks' series of evangelistic services were held last September, conducted in a way to give everybody an opportunity to hear the Gospel and accept Christ if they so desired. There have been no additions to the church for over a year. The Gospel is faithfully preached from Sabbath to Sabbath. There seems to be a spiritual lethargy over the entire community.

A Church in Full Revival

In full sympathy with the spirit of your editorial, I write briefly concerning a blessed revival in our place. The Methodist Episcopal church here has a membership of 80. In September last an evangelist came and for the entire month the fire of God's grace was bright in our midst. Over fifty were savingly reached, and mostly adults. Only two children have joined our church out of the entire number. This was not a Sunday School harvesting. The converts were mostly men. One was eighty years of age. A soldier nearly seventy was converted, and others aged fifty and sixty. Many had formed the habit of drink and great was the power of conviction and most precious the coming into the full freedom of Christ. We had no card signing, no hand raising, but just conversions! Men and women remained for prayers and going home regenerated. On October 2, twenty-four joined our church on probation. On November 6, five more. On December 4, two more.

We are glad to place on record our firmest conviction that the Church of the living God has a message for this age.

Stepney, Conn. REV. A. L. HUBBARD.

The Saloon the Church's Enemy

Our church (the First Baptist) is neither gaining nor losing in membership. While some drop out, others are taken in. There has been a large debt on the church ever since we built it, about ten years ago. Much time and hard work has been expended to keep up the finances. Our pastor is laboring faithfully. I can not say that the church is making spiritual progress, neither is it losing ground. To my mind, one of the great drawbacks to spiritual work here is the saloon evil. There are so many places (over thirty) where strong drinks are sold, and there is not a determined fight on the part of the churches to down them. The greater part of our young men are seen frequenting these places. There seems to be an increasing disregard for law and order in this community. READER.

The Case of a Typical Country Church

I have just risen from the perusal of the last number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for 1911. It is a grand paper, unique and original in conception, world-wide in its work, broad in its charities, optimistic, able, sincere and lofty in its ideals. The editorial on "Church Work" has so happily met my approbation that I could not resist the impulse to comply at once with your recommendation.

Our church (Congregational) is a country church in central New York, organized in 1801. Its membership is about 500. For fifty years it was the leading factor in the growth of the community. I joined it when I was a lad of fifteen, more than sixty years ago. Since then, changes have gradually crept in, sad changes that to us old members seem subversive of the sturdy faith and practice of those early days. Then, the church was all in all; our religion, our ethics, our morality, our intellectuality, our recreation and social bond of fellowship. Now, the press, new-fangled things, steam, electricity, inventions and what not, have changed the simplicity and poverty of life to a bewildering complexity so absorbing that we older ones can hardly catch our breath in the mad race for supremacy. We are passing through a world-wide movement or transition state in matters of belief. The rather modern appearance of the so-called "higher criticism" was perhaps the entering wedge in removing the props and weakening our faith in the infallibility of the Bible, which has resulted in many rejecting it altogether. Religion and belief is not the vital thing it was a few years ago. The change has bred apathy and indifference. So, amid unbelief, worldliness, vanity fairs, the strife and strenuousness of life, I find at least a partial solution, and the balance may perhaps be laid to the feeling among the working class, that the Church is no better than others. What wonder that it suffers defeat and that our attendance has shrunken to probably about one to five; that is, out of its membership of 500, we have an average attendance of 100. Then there are the non-churchgoers. We are confronted with a condition truly discouraging if not alarming. Still, we are considered a prosperous church. There is a minority of interested workers, especially among the women, who are bravely and nobly doing good work and making it an agency of great good locally, and also in benefactions and missionary work. We make annually an effort in some direction for evangelistic services; but for the last few years, without notable success. Still the membership holds its own. Short pastorates of late years have been the rule. Pastors don't seem to measure up to the requirements of an aggressive forward movement that will reach non-churchgoers. I think ours is fairly a representative country church for this region. Recommendations and suggestions such as you indicate would approximately meet the conditions of a large majority.

Homer, N. Y. D. CARPENTER.

A Church Spiritually Alive

Our church (Lutheran) is gaining steadily in membership. The old Gospel is faithfully preached. We are making spiritual progress (1) because of the faithful preaching of the Word; (2) because of the earnest prayers and the consistent Christian lives led by many of our older members; (3) because of the encouragement coming from the splendid body of young men and women who have united with the church in the past seven years; (4) because of the children being catechised and the babies being baptized and the emphasis on the fundamental truth all along the line.

I am certain the Methodist church in our village could also answer very encouragingly these questions; also the Evangelical church in the country three miles off, built over fifty years ago, which I attended when a boy and young man. It is very inspiring to pass these three churches, with which I have been associated, and to be able to answer encouragingly for all of them, They are all making fine progress. C. A. KUENZLI.

Prayer Has Helped the Church Most

Our church (Swedish Congregational) is constantly gaining. You ask, "Is the Gospel faithfully preached?" As I am the preacher, I suppose I should not answer this question; yet, before God, I dare say it is. What has helped the church most? Prayer! Prayer! Prayer! We have been praying for a revival about six months and on New Year's Day it came. Five young men and two young women gave their hearts to God. The work goes on. This is old-time religion. (REV.) C. J. HOHN.

East Orange, N. J.

A Church of Prayer and Work

Our church is in good condition. It is composed of members who have been regenerated and born of the Holy Spirit. The love of Christ, implanted in the heart, makes us love each other and prompts us to work for our Master. Our church is composed of praying members. We believe in prayer; but when we pray, we try to answer our own prayers as far as it lies in our power, and then we believe that our heavenly Father will do for us that which we cannot do for ourselves. Our church loves her pastor. We pray for him. He is Spirit-filled, and when he preaches he comes with a message of love that is food to the soul.

Providence, Ky. JOSEPH HART.

Money and Pleasure Come First

I am a Congregationalist. I feel that our church is too stiff, with an uneasy attitude, unless toward the wealthy members. Poor ones are not a desirable acquisition. Our church sacrifices spiritual for financial and social success. Prayer meeting is neglected. Some do all the work, instead of all together. Dances and cards are in some homes, too. There is some wheat among the chaff, however. Of five churches here all are in need of a Pentecostal revival. READER.

Do We Neglect Foreign Missions?

All the great church leaders state that missions are the chief business of the Church. "There are a thousand million heathen who have never heard the name of Jesus Christ," they say. Then the proofs of the neglect of this great duty are these facts: 250 million dollars are given to the home church enterprises, and only 7½ millions are sent out. Our very children, it is said, consume 11 million dollars worth of chewing gum! Again, there seems to be little interest shown in this cause in many churches. No system is used in collecting money for missions. Any day of the year, but generally only once, and in some churches not a direct, regular contributions, amounting to nothing, are taken up for this interest. There is but little speaking in many churches on this great subject.

Now, the proofs that the neglect of this great duty is the chief cause of the decline in most churches are these: Wherever any church has adequately supported missions, that church has taken on new life and prosperity. This statement has been repeatedly made by our missionary leaders. On the other hand, without any exceptions, they say that those churches which do not do so, decline and languish, and all other interests of the church suffer. We have seen this decline ourselves. For instance, in my own church, a certain small sum (a sum large enough to buy a good suit of clothes only) was raised by a well-to-do country congregation for Foreign Missions in response to an earnest appeal, while they spend many times the amount on their own church. The other churches in our locality manifest the same indifference. Now, it is a fact that these churches are suffering (so far as I can determine) from the spiritual drought. Wrangling and bickering over the assessments for the preacher's salary and over other causes are constantly going on. Attendance at these churches is at a very low ebb. Conversions are few. Fewer still (I think) join these churches. I believe that Christ spews out an unmissionary church. I humbly hope that the above facts may cause some to stop and ponder their ways. In spite of the foregoing, the writer believes that the church members are the only ones that are carrying on righteousness in the earth, and that Christ's cause is gradually triumphing all over the earth, and will finally win. A Gospel Service on Shipboard in the South Atlantic

A MISSIONARY correspondent of this paper sends us the interesting photograph here reproduced, with the simple note: "My congregation on the steerage of the North Castle on the way out." The passengers, who are bound perhaps for Australia, sit quietly and appreciatively on deck listening to the Gospel as the steamer speeds southward. It is an improvised service, under unusual conditions; but the good seed is never sowed in vain.

Why Young People Neglect the Church

The members, especially the young men and girls, are dropping out, probably not intentionally, but unconsciously. Now, is this fulfilling any part of prophecy, or what in your opinion is the reason for their lack of interest? It seems to me the fathers and mothers are not faithful enough in their own attendance, and perhaps if we all did not belong to so many clubs and societies we could give more time to the things that should come first in our lives. This, I think, is one reason why young people are not more faithful in church work.

Avondale, R. I. FRED N. BURDICK.

A Worldly Neighborhood

As I think a word of courage often proves a blessing, I will try your advice and hope I may be able to do some good here. The few people here are harder to work among than any who they have never had a chance to hear the Gospel. They are all speculators, and are passing the time in a way to suit themselves. It was much rather live where I could attend worship and have my church work, but it appears this duty calls me here.

Dent, Idaho. A WORKER FOR THE CAUSE.

Causes of Spiritual Decline

I am acquainted with a few of the churches here and several in neighboring villages. My acquaintance does not inspire me with great gladness of heart. Taking the members within reasonable distance, one or two miles, of each place of worship, the attendance is usually very small. The almost complete absence of children and young people from the morning and evening services is painfully evident. The preaching, in some particulars, is pleasing, largely professional. It lacks evangelistic ring and subduing earnestness. Sin has hardly any existence in these days. God has ceased to be angry with the wicked, because they are not to be found, save in the slums and heathen lands, and there, moral responsibility does not count. The doctrines of repentance, justifying faith, the new birth, the witness of the Spirit, full salvation, are seldom if ever preached. I have heard many sermons and addresses, but never once, if I were an anxious soul seeking salvation, could I learn from any one or all of them, how I could find peace with God. If sung, hymns as "Rock of Ages," "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," or "Just as I Am," were sung, I might have had a chance, but those hymns are being displaced by modern jingles.

If with few exceptions the people do not come to church, may not the minister as a pastor take some of God's saving messages to them in their homes or elsewhere? I fear this is not done. The clubs, the guilds, the brotherhoods, the leagues, the social functions, the committees must be attended, with many other mis-

Homesickness

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE man who wrote "Home, Sweet Home," was a rolling stone. For years he wandered from place to place, and often he heard his beautiful song as its melody rang out to him, a passerby, from homes replete with comfort and luxury.

Mid pleasures and palaces though we may roam,
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home.

Analyzing this sentiment, we are confronted by various differing ideals entertained by home-loving people. I knew a man who had an incurable habit of appearing at home in the middle of the forenoon or afternoon when meals had been cleared away and other household work was in progress, with the cheerful anticipation of being immediately served with a delicious repast. He remarked one day, "The charm about one's home is that one may have a meal at any time without being bound to a fixed hour." His wife, being an angel, with a fairy-like gift of lifting a wand and producing from her stores breakfast, luncheon or dinner on demand, never hinted to her husband that his desultory fashion of asking for meals when it suited his convenience was in the least an embarrassment to her.

An otherwise admirable youth, on his return from college at vacation time, apparently claims the privilege of dressing like a tramp in the privacy of his home. He tells his over-indulgent mother that when away from home one must pay attention to his style of clothing, but that in his father's house he may wear any old thing he chooses. These examples are to show that for some mistaken people home is merely a place of privilege. They may do as they like, doing nothing very wrong, it is true, but to a certain extent interfering with system, and showing too slight deference to the wishes of mothers and sisters. There are thousands of folk whose love for home strikes deep its roots into the soil, or is founded upon family affection.

A dear little girl of ten, Norma Bunting, of Hamilton, O., was away from home on a visit last summer. The darling child was homesick, and she explained what made her so in the stanzas which follow. They are very well written and do credit to the little author:

A Mother's Good-Night Kiss

When I have gone away
A little while to stay,
It's nice to get back home
And have a mother's kiss bestowed.

Although a good time I may enjoy,
With a doll or some other toy,
There's still one thing I miss,
And that's a mother's good-night kiss.

What to Do, and How to Do It Many women permit themselves to be entirely too much puzzled and bothered about little details of etiquette. They hesitate as to the best way of acknowledging an invitation, writing a letter of thanks, expressing sympathy with a friend in affliction or setting a table for a formal dinner. The truth is that conventionality rests upon common sense and convenience. No one can go far wrong who has a kind heart, a desire to make people happy in her own house and an intention of showing courtesy and sympathy in the right time and place. The reason why an invitation to dinner must be accepted or declined by note as soon as possible after it has arrived is that a hostess prefers to have an even number of guests at her table, and if the one first asked cannot come, she wishes to know it at once so that the place may be filled. Only great intimacy justifies a hostess in sending an eleventh-hour invitation to a guest, and when this is done politeness requires that it shall be explained.

In leaving cards at the home of friends, good usage ordains that when the acquaintance is slight and the calling occasional, a visiting card should be left for each woman in the family where the call is made. To waste visiting cards in this way when calling upon intimate friends would be absurd. There is an omission of courtesy peculiarly American in which a reform is necessary. When visiting a home in which maids are employed, there is no decline of dignity if a pleasant "good-morning" or "afternoon" recognizes their existence. The same kind courtesy should be extended to young women who wait upon one in shops, and the "thank you" for attention spoken by the customer should not be omitted.

Mr. Pepys on Parade Among those standard works which have long formed a part of every well selected library, place has always been found for the Diary of Mr. Samuel Pepys, who lived in the seventeenth century, took an active part in political and social affairs in the time of Charles the Second, and set down from day to day in his private memoranda everything that he saw, did and thought, with a sort of undress honesty and childlike naiveté. Sir Walter Scott and Lord Macaulay frankly delighted in the confessions of Mr. Pepys. The Diary in its complete form is expensive, and our younger readers in the host of other books which claim attention are losing sight of its value and of the pleasure it would afford them. A young literary man of New York, Edward Frank Allen, had a happy thought one day. Straightway he put the thought into material form, and the result is a modest but charming volume bearing as title the Red Letter Days of Samuel Pepys.

Mr. Allen has done his work of selection and compilation uncommonly well. Within a compass of three hundred pages he gives us in Mr. Pepys' own words a portrait of this old-time gentleman at home and in society. Whatever was going on in England in Mr. Pepys' period, and whatever was enacted in London was seen by and taken part in by this incomparable diarist. The book meets a felt want and will be an introduction for many readers to the larger work from which the extracts are made. It appears simultaneously in New York and London, and may be found on sale in any book store.

The Bride's Share in the New Home As the new home could not exist without the bride's presence, as she kindles the fire on the domestic hearth and from the hour of marriage tends it with wifely care, her share would seem to be that of the queen on the throne. Royalty and service go hand in hand in this life, and the woman most loved and honored, most queenly in station, is the dear wife on whom it must be admitted more than half of life's drudgery falls.

The bride's share in furnishing the new home is the provision of the household linen. This includes everything in daily use, sheets, pillow cases, tablecloths, napkins, towels and the daintier articles of needlework which go to the adornment of a house. According to her circumstances the bride's provision for the future may be sumptuous or limited. If she has enough to serve the household needs for a year, allowing a little margin for emergencies, she is sufficiently supplied. If her mother began, as French, German and Dutch mothers do, to fill the daughter's bridal chest in the daughter's early childhood, she may carry to her home an outfit of linen which will not need replenishing in years.

The bride's trousseau need not cover every article of wearing apparel that she will require for a half dozen years, but, if possible, it should be ample for the first twelve months. She should bestow as much time and thought upon her outfit for housekeeping as upon her personal wearing apparel.

Women in Council As several mothers have written inquiring about kindergarten literature and devices for the entertainment of small children, I take pleasure in giving the first place this week to the following helpful letter. I wish to add to it my own caution against giving beads to little ones, who do not know that everything is not to be put into the tiny mouth.

"As a kindergartner I love all little children and would like to suggest Mother Stories, by Maud Lindsay. It can be had from Thomas Charles Company, Chicago, Ill. They also have blocks for building called the Sixth Gift, which I think any mother would like, and there are wooden beads for stringing which little children enjoy. Their catalogues will suggest other articles. Babies playing alone might put the beads in their mouths. I don't know whether there would be any danger. Mothers know better than kindergartners about such things. I think that big rubber balls are very nice, too.

Japanese Girls at the Well

THE traveler in Japan is constantly reminded, even in that land of rapid change, that he is in the conservative and changeless East. These pretty maidens go to the well, let down the buckets and draw them up, as the women of Japan have done for centuries. Everything in the Sunrise Kingdom is picturesque. It is as though the Island Empire enjoyed perpetual youth.

OUR BOYS AND GIRLS

HAREBELLS

Blue sky and bluer sea,
And harebell at my feet,
Blue and yet more utterly,
Why is your hue so sweet?

What fibre of my soul
Thrills at your loveliness?
Why should a tint control
My heart like a caress?

Blue sky and bluer sea,
And harebell at my feet,
How can mere color be Beyond all telling sweet?

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS: What really good times we are beginning to have in the Cozy Corner! Your enthusiastic interest, your letters and good work, and the delight that your earnings and prizes seem to bring you, are making of the Young People's Department in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a really splendid place for boys and girls to meet and accomplish things. Perhaps some day, if we keep on in this same successful way, we shall be telling our own little boys and girls all about the Cozy Corner that we helped to make the very best Boys' and Girls' Department in any magazine in the world. That is a very ambitious suggestion, but I believe that we can carry it out, right here in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD; and what is more, I believe we will.

I especially want to thank those of you who wrote calling our attention to the fact that "Snowflakes," a little poem beginning,

Dolly, there are nice white feathers
Coming from the clouds, just see, was not original by the little girl who sent it in to us and won a prize for it. The incident was a distinct oversight on our part. Your interest was very gratifying. Now let us understand this point once for all. Send only your own original work to Cozy Corner Contests. We have said this repeatedly, right here in the Cozy Corner itself, and we do want our boys and girls to maintain the highest standard of honor in this matter. To send in other people's work is not only disappointing to the editors, but it is distinctly unfair to the other boys and girls trying for prizes, who would never dream of doing such a thing.

My Own Model Aeroplane

By Arnold Collins, age 10

TAKE a ¼-inch stick, 12 inches long, and a ½-inch cube of extremely light wood. Drill a hole in the block near the bottom with a fine awl or heated hairpin. Cut away the stick, and then nail and glue the back into it (see Figure 1). Make a hole the same way ¼ inch from the opposite end of the stick; now insert a hairpin, and bend it round the extreme end of the stick for a hook for the rubber motor (see Figure 2). To make the planes, get 4 feet of rattan, about ⅛ inch, soak it over night, and curve 10 inches of it into a plane 4 x ½ inches. The rest of the rattan will make a plane 2 x 10 inches. Cover the planes with thin silk, glued down firmly. Fasten the planes to the stick with rubber bands so that they may be slid up and down to control the flight. For the propeller get a piece of straight-grained wood ½ inch square by 3 inches long and bore a hole exactly in the centre of it for the shaft. Curve out the blocks so that they are at an angle of 45 degrees and at right angles to each other. Into the hole insert a hairpin, one end of which should be clinched to the propeller; the other end should pass through a couple of glass beads into the blocks at the end of the stick and bent into a hook. Between the hooks on the stick loop rubber enough to make the propeller run something over 10 seconds when wound up with 200 turns. This model will fly either backward or forward. If it dives to the ground move the plane forward; if it tries to go up vertically, move the plane a little farther back. Under good conditions this model will fly perfectly over 100 feet.

A Two Dollar Prize Winner—January Contest

A Good Idea

Lillian Dunnert, age 16, writes and tells of a good idea for church fairs.

DEAR COZY CORNER: Our Sunday School class has undertaken to have a booth at the annual fair given by our church in February. Most of us have been reading the life and works of Louisa M. Alcott in our supplementary school reading course, so we decided to have a booth at the fair conducted exactly as we think "Little Women" would have conducted it. "Amy" is to sell all kinds of pretty fancy things for girls—dainty collar-and-cuff sets, hair ribbons and bows, fancy aprons, hand-embroidered stockings, sachets and perfumery, and the quaintest little night-caps with sachet in the crown to keep your hair smooth and sweet, just exactly as "Amy" would have done.

"Meg" is to sell household articles, principally bags of all kinds, because, you see, they are easily made, are effective, and sell well. There will be dust-bags, string-bags, laundry-bags, work-bags of all kinds, broom-bags and shoe-bags, stocking-bags and little reticules, and nice cretonne bags for curtains and portières to hang in during the summer instead of packing them away. There are more than twenty different varieties of bags to sell, besides dusting-caps, iron-holders, broom-racks, cuff-protectors, and other nice domestic things that "Meg" would have loved.

"Beth" is to have cut flowers and potted plants at one end of the "Little Women" booth, and "Joe" has volunteered to get up an entertainment just as the real "Joe" would have done. It is to be a Punch-and-Judy puppet-show, suggested by the very one you sent us, Miss Porter. One of the girls in the class has made a puppet-box and has dressed some real dolls, and gives that little puppet play perfectly. She is to be "Joe," and will charge five cents to see her "pinny, pinny puppet show." Everybody is delighted with our plan.

Special February Prize Contest

THE Aunt in the Cozy Corner will liberally award money prizes and many supplementary prizes of best books, pictures, games, kodaks, toys, etc., for original work sent in by boys and girls.

TWO DOLLARS for best story or article in less than 300 words. Subject: "Something I Have Made Myself."

TWO DOLLARS for best verse. Subjects: "The Attic," "The North Wind," or "Good Night."

TWO DOLLARS for best drawings. Subject: A Headpiece for February.

ONE DOLLAR each for best puzzles. Any sort of a good puzzle (must be accompanied by the answer).

For the Little People.

A rebus to guess:

My first is as little as little can be,
My second is only a boy, you see,
My third is the sky of a sunshiny day,
My whole is an old-fashioned nursery lay.

For the best picture of the answer to this rebus, the first prize will be a beautiful bisque doll for the little girls, for the boys a splendid set of lead soldiers.

In awarding prizes and gifts, the comparative ages of the boys and girls will be considered, as well as the quality of their work. All work must be original.

The February Prize Competition will close February 18. Names of prize-winners and a page of the boys' and girls' own work will be published in the Cozy Corner February 22.

To enter these contests you need not be a regular subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Note: A Cozy Corner Plum

In next week's Cozy Corner we will publish the first of a series of especially interesting and fascinating articles on Miniature Air Craft, by Mr. Francis Arnold Collins, author of The Boy's Book of Model Aeroplanes.

Lovingly and faithfully,
The Aunt in the Cozy Corner,

Serial Story by FLORENCE MORSE KINGSLEY

XVIII—Continued

I AM told," said Mr. Todd to Sutton, the proprietor, "that this is one of the few properly managed tels in this part of the country, with ening dinners, breakfasts à la carte, id so forth."

Sutton silently shook his heavy body, s wide mouth turning up at the corrs, an exercise which passed with m as a laugh.

"Oh, yes," he said, "we're stylish an' to date all right, when it comes to ven o'clock breakfasts an' six o'clock nners. We've kind of changed our y around here t' 'commodate our trons. We calc'late t' please."

And so it came about that young hitcomb sat down to dinner that ght with Mr. Albert Todd. Little by tle the two fell into friendly converstion, and David, at first irritable and lent, passed all at once into his alteating mood, when he desired nothing much as to talk about himself.

Not once did the tactful Mr. Todd ention the subject of insurance, and appeared wonderfully interested in avid's account of his life in the West; his failures, few and far between, d of his successes, social and otherise, which according to David had en many and remarkable. Mr. Todd as a man of the world, that much was ear, with no foolish or fanatical rejudices. After dinner the two, in state of postprandial amity, strolled ross to the bar-room, where they artook of various cooling drinks compounded under David's direction by e alert young person behind the bar. nd when later they strolled out to the azza and David produced cigarettes, ey had fallen into relations of such xceeding friendliness that David reened the conversation in a more intiate tone than he had yet taken.

"This is the most confoundedly upid hole a man ever dropped into," observed through the fragrant noke wreaths.

"It looks kind of peaceful and othing," agreed Mr. Todd, with a uckle; "I guess I can stand it for w days, though."

He looked away up the dusty street here an occasional pedestrian enlivned the solitude. "Thinking of setling here?" he asked.

David scowled.

"Yes," he said. "Out in the country ways further."

"Then you'll have hopes of striking e metropolis here occasionally?" eried Mr. Todd facetiously. "I ouldn't want to get too far away."

David's eyes were still fixed and owning.

"What do you think of a man of my xperience settling down in a place ke this to raise apples?" he asked. Sometimes I think I'm several kinds f a fool for doing it."

Mr. Todd spat thoughtfully over the ail.

"That depends," he said tentatively, ut with a keen look at the other.

"Yes, of course," said David; "take any way you like, is the game worth e candle? Once I'm tied up here, I uppose I'll have to stand by the rest f my life. Do I want to do it? Would ou want to do it? Honest now."

The small spare gentleman who had troduced himself to Barford society nder the name of Albert Todd smiled houghtfully.

"Well, it strikes me as a bit slow for y taste. What do you say to a game f cards to pass away the time?"

David shook his head.

"I don't take much to cards," he aid; "the other chap generally wins, nd I like to be on the winning side."

He tramped up and down the piazza a few times, impatiently kicking at the railings as he paused to turn.

"There's a man in this town I've got to see on rather disagreeable business," he said at last. "I've been putting it off for several days; but I believe I'll do it now. So long. See you in the morning."

Left to himself Mr. Todd elevated his feet to the railing, as if to indulge in a prolonged period of postprandial meditation. In the gathering twilight he watched David's muscular figure swinging along the street. He was walking like a man with a purpose. After a minute or two of keen-eyed watchfulness Mr. Todd quietly arose, clapped his hat on his head, and strolled toward the steps.

"Goin' out t' take in the town?" inquired a voice from the rear.

The insurance man glanced at the slim youth in the rather untidy white apron who stood in the doorway.

"W'y, yes," he replied, very pleasantly indeed. "I thought I might as well."

"I'd advise you not to have much to do with that fellow you was talkin' to," pursued the youth sulkily. "He's one of our customers, but I don't care. Talk 'bout cards; he cleaned me out of a month's wages one night last week, then laughed at me for bein' mad. I ain't got no use fer him."

"I don't know about that," Mr. Todd said pacifically. "He seems like a nice sort. Nothing really vicious, or——"

"He's a good-fer-nothin' blowhard; that's what he is," said the bar-tender rancorously. "An' that's what I tell Jennie. But she— I'd like t' punch his head; that's all!"

"Who's Jennie?"

"She waited on your table t' supper. She's the prettiest girl in this town."

"Oh," said Mr. Todd, understandingly.

"She's prettier 'n that Preston girl ever thought of bein'—that's his girl. He's engaged t' her. But some folks want the earth."

"That's so," observed Mr. Todd smilingly. "And sometimes," he added, "they get it, too!"

This speech appeared to irritate the youth exceedingly. "Huh?" he exploded violently. "Well, I'd like to punch his head; that's all."

XIX

David's suddenly formed resolution carried him swiftly to the one big house of the village, where he rang the bell. The night being warm the door stood open and he could look through the screen into the dimly lighted hall. To the left of the passage was Jarvis' library, and David, waiting impatiently before the outer door, perceived that the master of the house was within, quietly reading by a shaded lamp. Somehow the sight stirred the unreasoning anger within him to a hotter glow. His unanswered summons appeared in the guise of a deliberate insult. Raising his walking stick he smote the door loudly. He saw the man within raise his eyes from his book, as if to listen, and repeated his knock smartly; then as Jarvis rose and came hastily toward the door, he spoke:

"Good evening, Mr. Jarvis," he said, mumbling the prefix so that it was little more than an inarticulate sound. "Guess your door bell isn't in working order."

Jarvis recognized his visitor with an involuntary start which David perceived with ill-disguised triumph.

"The fellow's afraid of me," he told

Fashions Change in Watch Cases

You usually know an old or out-of-date watch by its case—not always because the case shows wear but because it is out of style. As a rule, the better the case the better the design and the longer it stays in style.

It is the worst possible economy to buy a cheap or a trashy watch case. It is not fair to a good movement to put it in a poorly made case. Then, too, the case represents a substantial part of your watch investment—and if you want your money's worth you must know who made the case as well as the movement.

The trade marks illustrated on this page are your safeguard. They are standard with the fine jewelry trade, and have been for 50 years. They mean absolute integrity in bullion value, in assay, in construction of a watch case. Be sure to find them. Every good jeweler in this country knows the marks and carries the cases. They are made for ladies' and men's watches—plain, engine-turned, engraved or enameled. All sizes, all patterns.

himself, and hung up his hat on the rack as if quite at his ease.

He followed Jarvis into the library and sat down, looking about him with cool curiosity.

"You've been expecting to see me, I dare say," he began, his eyes returning from their tour of inspection to the other man's face.

Jarvis returned the look doubtfully.

"It occurred to me that you might—"

"Yes; I do," interrupted David. "You're entirely right, sir."

Having said this much in a loud, aggressive tone, David stopped short. He had become suddenly aware that Jarvis was looking at, or rather through him, in a way which made him irritably conscious of his hands, his feet, the set of his collar and the material of his light summer clothes; then those strange eyes went deeper; they were busying themselves with his thoughts, his motives; they even saw his fears, which crowded forward, a cloud of gibbering shapes out of his past.

He spoke again, hurriedly, and backed up his words with a laugh, which sounded foolishly loud in the quiet room.

"Well," he said, "now that you've had time to look me over, how d' you like me? Think I'll do—eh?"

"No," Jarvis said quietly, almost sadly. "I'm afraid not. But I don't intend to trust my own judgment—entirely."

He sighed deeply and looked down, as if there was nothing more to be seen or said.

David straightened himself in his chair with a jerk.

"See here," he said truculently. "I was joking, you know; you were staring at me as if you'd never seen a human being before. But now I'd like you to answer me straight. What d' you mean by saying I won't do? What business is it of yours what I——"

He choked a little with the rage that was consuming him.

"Why, confound your impudence!" he cried, his face flaming with anger.

"I owe you an apology, sir," said Jarvis, with stately composure. "I ought not to have spoken as I did. But there is much at stake."

"Not for you," said David insolently.

He fell to staring at Jarvis, striving to imitate the other's disconcerting look.

"She loves me, you know."

He had not intended to taunt his rival, but the words slipped out without volition. He was glad of it, in view of the blighting change that swept over the other's face.

"Yes," Jarvis said dully; "I know that."

He was realizing all at once that the blow that felled Whitcomb must reach her tender breast also.

"There's no use of beating about the bush," David went on. "She told me about your visit to her the other night. At first I didn't catch on about that remarkable client of yours and the care of the interesting child and all that. But when I got out of her the fact that you had been courting her while I was away, of course I was on to your little game."

He paused to allow his words their full weight, exulting in the look of quiet despair that appeared to have settled upon Jarvis' face.

"You thought if you couldn't catch and hold her one way, you would another. You planned to keep her from me! Deny it if you dare!"

Jarvis looked up, opened his lips as if minded to reply; then his head drooped, and again he sighed deeply. He was striving to master himself; that self which even now struggled like a leashed hound under his iron hand.

"I must be fair," he groaned half aloud. "I must—I must, for her sake."

"What's that?" inquired David smartly. "We may as well have it out first as last, you know."

"Yes," agreed Jarvis, rousing himself. "I didn't mean to—yet. But——"

He looked calmly at David.

"Can we not talk this over in a reasonable way?" he asked. "There is really no need of anger, or——"

"Oh, come, man; let's get down to business," cried David, vastly pleased with himself and his own acumen.

"'You can fool some of the people all of the time,' you know," he quoted with a confident laugh; "and you did succeed in fooling Barbara nicely; but the minute I heard you were in love with her, of course I——"

"One thing first," interrupted Jarvis; "did she tell you—what had passed between us of her own free will?"

David burst into a laugh.

"Oh, that's where the shoe pinches, is it?" he said good-humoredly. "Well, I don't mind informing you that Barbara didn't tell me a single thing about you—not at first. She's a good little scout, Barbie is, and she saved your pride all right for you. She'd never have told me, I guess; but I taxed her with it, and she couldn't deny it. Some girls would have snapped you up quick, with all your money and everything, and with me supposedly buried up in the Klondyke. But not Barbara. She's worth while, that girl."

"Yes," mused Jarvis. "She is—worth while."

"You wouldn't catch me loafing around this dead-and-alive hole for many women," David went on, drumming with his fingers on the edge of his chair. "As it is, I've had about all I can stand of it; and she won't give in and marry me—won't even wear my ring—till that client of yours—that peculiar, hard-to-get-along-with individual you're representing—can be either bought off, or disposed of in some way. Naturally, neither of us want to be under obligations to—you!" he finished dramatically.

"Does she—suppose that I——"

"No," he said. "Oh, no! Barbie isn't gifted with a very keen imagination. She swallowed all you told her about that singular out-of-town client of yours. She seems to have implicit faith in you."

A subtle lightning flash leaped from Jarvis' eyes.

"She's quite right to trust me," he said calmly. "I'll be glad if you can do the same."

"Oh, come now, it's too late for any more joking between us!" cried David roughly. "You can't pull the wool over my eyes. You gave her that money, Jarvis, you know you did. And you did it just so as to tie her down. It's a blooming shame!"

Jarvis had risen, and David sprang eagerly from his chair to face him. The two men were of equal height, and for an instant David's boyish blue eyes strove to master Jarvis, glance to glance. Then he drew back, baffled, furious.

"You aren't going to stick to that cock-and-bull story a minute longer with me," he blustered. "You know very well where the money came from!"

Jarvis bowed ceremoniously.

"Certainly, I know," he acknowledged.

"Didn't you give it to her?"

"I shall not answer you."

"Well, you did, and I can prove it."

"How?"

David sprang forward with a triumphant laugh and snatched a small object from the desk.

"I have been sitting where I could look at your writing traps," he exulted. "And I saw—this!"

Jarvis appeared quite unmoved.

"That is my seal," he observed, "with my family crest. What of it?"

A Winning Start*

PAUL evidently believed that the saints in heaven are closely following the course of affairs on earth. "Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses."

"Gideon, Barak, Samson, Jephthah, David, Samuel and the prophets" are looking down upon us, as we turn our faces toward the prize set before us. It is as though we were a part of a vast athletic contest, on the issue of which far more than a mere transient wave of joy or sorrow depends.

The eternal welfare of a soul hangs in the balance. Moreover, among the "great cloud of witnesses" are scores and hundreds of our earthly companions, before whom we are setting an example, often far more influential than we know.

But ere we can run the race, we must "lay aside every sin."

You cannot "start fair," if a single beloved sin weighs you down. Such sins may follow you up—they may grasp your flying garments, here or there, and strive to hinder you—but shake them off—strike them with heavy blows—let them see that you love them no longer. Soon they will leave you, and then you may have a good assurance of winning the race.

The great poet Robert Browning describes in one of his longer works the race of life.

He says, in the person of an ambitious youth:

—buoyant and rejoicing was the spirit
With which I looked out how to end my course:
—I would wear myself out, like that morn
Which wasted not a sunbeam: every hour
I would make mine, and die.

The hero goes on, tasting pleasure after pleasure, until he finds

All faith has gone from me
While darkness hastens quickly.

He cries out in his anguish:

O God, where do they tend—these struggling aims?
The soul . . . would have
Its utmost pleasure filled, but, that complete,
Commanding, for commanding, sickens it.
. . . And what is that I hunger for but God?
My God, my God, . . . there is that in me
Which turns to thee, which loves or which should love.
Take from me powers and pleasures, let me die
Ages, so I see thee! I am knit round
As with a charm by sin and lust and pride,
Yet through my wandering dreams . . . oft have I stood by thee—
In the damp night by weeping Olivet,
Or leaning on thy bosom, proudly less,
Or dying with thee on the loney cross,
Or witnessing thine outburst from the tomb.
—my last state is happy, free from doubt
Or touch of fear.

Thus be it ever with the runner of life's race. May he be spared from falling while he treads "the slippery paths of youth," to meet that "last state," "free from doubt or touch of fear,"—which is the crown of the end.

In Victor Hugo's great story of the battle of Waterloo he describes many of the minor elements which had worked together to defeat Napoleon. He pictured that wonderful man as marching up and down Europe, boasting in his infinite conceit, of his "lucky star," which was bound to insure victory to him everywhere.

Then Victor Hugo asks, "Was it possible for Napoleon to win this battle? No.

"Why? On account of Wellington? No. On account of Blucher? No.

"It was on account of God."

Never was truer word spoken. No longer could the overweening pride and blasphemous and cruel selfishness of the great general inspire his adoring troops to superhuman feats. God's hour had struck. He raiseth up and he casteth down.

Through his help alone may we run the great race successfully.

Christian Endeavor—Why?*

A FAMOUS man has said that a great part of success is, having done the thing before.

He was right. It is practice that makes perfect.

All experience shows us that we can scarcely begin too early to rehearse for the great drama of life. The power to speak in public is a most useful one, but it usually has to be acquired by degrees. Before your mates, even in the Junior Endeavor, you can express yourself with far less embarrassment than before older people.

Once having learned to use your voice in that small public, you discover that when the need arises, you can talk also before the older ones.

Later, in the church prayer-meeting, you may find yourself able to say something helpful, brief and to the point, because you have learned to speak in your youth in your Christian Endeavor Society.

And remember, it is a great gift to be able to express yourself on your feet, in clear, terse language, and without embarrassment. It will help you in many an emergency of your life.

Good committee work is most useful in the church. You learn to do it in your Christian Endeavor.

You learn there, also, how to deal with people, in order to best influence them. And you learn how to value and use your own faculties, for youth is the time when the soul begins to find itself, and feels

This main miracle, that thou art thou,
With power on thine own act and on the world.

Dr. Farrar has told a beautiful story of a little prince, who was very fond of his good tutor.

One day the tutor seemed very sad. The prince wanted to ask him what was the matter, but he did not dare. He asked one of the servants who knew the tutor well, and was told that the tutor had a bad son, who had contracted a large debt. He could not pay the debt and the good father felt compelled to assume it.

He did not see how he was to earn so much, and the worry lay heavy on his soul.

The little prince had no money of his own, but he was often paid for good conduct; and as he turned the trouble over and over in his mind, he had a bright thought.

At breakfast the next morning he said to his grandfather, the king, "If I write well in my copybook for a whole week, will you give me something? Will you give me fifty dollars?"

"That's a great deal of money," remarked the king. "What will you do with it?"

"That is a secret," said the boy, "but it is a good secret, and I will tell it to you some time and you will like it."

The king promised, and the boy worked faithfully on his copybook. Every letter was formed most carefully and there was no blot nor mistake on any page.

The tutor had never known him to work so well and so steadily before. He could not understand it.

At the end of the week, the prince took his book to the king, and a few minutes later he returned with a bag containing the fifty dollars.

"I found out you needed money," he said lovingly to his tutor, "so I worked hard and I have earned some for you."

The Christian Endeavor is our beloved tutor. It needs money and help of all sorts. Let us give it affectionately and faithfully.

The story relates that the little prince was made far happier by his gift than was the tutor.

So your labors for your beloved society will fill your own heart with joy, while they help on the great cause of God in the world.

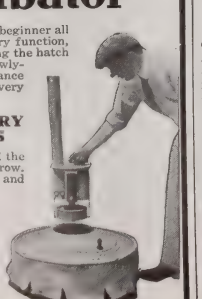
Perfect Equipment is THE Secret of Our Success!



With the experience gained in operating the Largest Poultry Plant in the World, our knowledge of the several makes of incubators is greater than the manufacturers'. For the sakes of economy WE built an incubator giving results never secured by any other make, and we now offer it to the public. The International Self-Humidifying Incubator

is responsible for our great success, and will give to the struggling beginner all of the profits and none of the losses. Absolutely automatic in every function, unvariable temperature, certain moisture from the moment of starting the hatch until nature requires a cessation in order to properly dry the newly-hatched unit of future profit—so thoroughly safeguarding its entrance into poultrydom as to guarantee its livability when raised under the very acme of "Foster Mothers," the

INTERNATIONAL SANITARY HOVERS

This Hover makes possible the rearing of the maximum of chicks and the minimum of deaths. 90 per cent. to 95 per cent. live and thrive and grow. It is the only device that contains the active principle of the hen, and the ingenuity of man can go no further.

Our best efforts are centered in the production of Day-Old-Chicks and Hatching Eggs from matured stock. No pullets' eggs are used except for table purposes.

We have just completed our 1911 catalogue on incubators and hovers, also our stock catalogue on Rancocas Strain BABY CHICKS and HATCHING EGGS. You are welcome to either or both of these catalogues. Send to-day.

Elijah the Lion-hearted*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

A Character Sketch of Elijah

ELIJAH was a sturdy mountaineer of Gilead, a region east of the Jordan. Tradition tells us he was a man of short stature and rugged countenance. His face was surrounded by a mass of dark hair and bushy beard, which had never been cut, for he was a Nazarite (Num. 6: 1-5). Both hair and beard were suggestive of a lion's mane and his tanned skin, too, was much the color of the lion. Not alone had he a semblance to the king of beasts physically, but he had lion-like qualities as well. We call him Elijah the lion-hearted, for such his words and deeds have shown him.

Remote from courts, corruption, crime,
In that high shepherd land,
With God alone his soul had grown
To stature bold and grand;
From Jacob's seed, or Jokshan's stock
Unknown, he stands God's seer—
The Highlander of prophecy,
God's glorious mountaineer.

King Ahab Reproved

Ahab, though a native and king of Israel, had, by his marriage with Jezebel, become identified with idolaters. He built a temple to Baal, and his wife stood sponsor for four hundred priests of Baal and likewise maintained at her own expense four hundred prophets of Astarte. Many of the Israelites were led away from the worship of the true God until idolatry became one of the distinguishing features of King Ahab's reign.

It was then that the voice of Elijah was raised like the tones of a great bell to reprove Ahab for his sin. The message given to him to deliver had a dire significance. It was — "There shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word." A drought with its consequent famine was looked upon as the greatest misfortune that could befall the land; therefore it must have been a very painful matter for King Ahab to contemplate such a calamity. But it was just the sort of punishment that was needed to make him and his people realize the enormity of their offense in turning away from the true God to the worship of the false.

The drought was sent as a terrible object lesson, for bad as the nation had become, such an affliction might lead to repentance and forgiveness. Moreover Baal, the worship of whom was at the bottom of the nation's wickedness, was regarded primarily as the god of agriculture and fertility; therefore, the curse of Elijah was a direct challenge from Jehovah. Let Baal remove the ban if he could.

Another reason was that the prolonged years of drought and famine were to prepare the nation for Elijah's reform. When the relief came it proved conclusively that Jehovah was the true God and Elijah his prophet. God, however, knew that Elijah would be in danger from the royal pair, so he told him, "Get thee hence."

Elijah's Retreat

Elijah did not falter when God said, "Get thee hence." Like Abraham, "he went out, not knowing whither," but knowing with WHOM he went. He had the assurance from God that he would be supplied with food by the ravens. So Elijah did according to the word of the Lord. He went and dwelt by the brook Cherith, which to him was as a well of waters. The ravens brought him food, God directed the birds where to find it. Though they had voracious appetites themselves, the ravens did not devour the supplies, but carried them to the good man in his rocky fastness by the brook. Thus doth God take care of his own.

. . . behind the dim unknown
Standeth God within the shadow
Keeping watch above his own.

Let our faith be strengthened as we pray in the time of need—"Give us this day our daily bread."

A Chinese Elijah

Mrs. Howard Taylor, of the Chinese Inland Mission, tells how God fed a Chinese prophet of our time in a similar way. It is a touching story of simple faith. Old Li was converted by hearing an impressive sermon on "Covetousness which is Idolatry." After attentively listening, the old man was greatly concerned to think that having given up idolatry he might be betrayed into the same sin by allowing a covetous spirit to have a place in his heart. To avoid this danger he determined to keep no money of his own and to possess no property. He accordingly turned over his house and little farm to his nephew, and devoted himself mainly to making known the Gospel, sustained in a great measure by the simple hospitality of those to whom he ministered. He opened up a refuge for the cure of opium smokers and by this he made himself a blessing to many unfortunates. His labors were wonderfully blessed of God spiritually, and resulted in the building up of a church in the Yoh-Yang district. After some years, however, what we now call the "higher criticism" and the scoffing of materialism reached the far-off field of the old man's endeavors. Some passages in the Holy Book were looked upon as fables, or at best but allegories to impress an ideal or sustain a contention. Old Li was told that in the story of Elijah, it was not ravens that fed the prophet, but Arabs who shared with him their own supplies. It was absurd to suppose that birds would act in the way described. This point of view did not at all commend itself to the old man's simple faith. He himself was to disprove it and bear direct testimony in his own case to the truth of the sacred narrative. A time came in his refuge work when he reached the end of his resources. There were no patients coming in for treatment and all his supplies were exhausted. At this juncture Li's cousin, a heathen priest of the village temple, came to his aid. The priest brought him supplies of bread and millet. Every time Li would receive the gift of food he would murmur, Tien-Fu-tih en-tien—"My heavenly Father's grace." At length the pagan priest became offended by these words. "If I supply the food," he exclaimed, "and did I not bring it you would starve." "But it is my heavenly Father who puts it into your heart to care for me," returned the old Christian. "Well, we'll see what will happen when I bring no more food." For two weeks the priest did not visit Li. The latter had no food or money to buy it, but he trusted in God. With simple faith he went into his chamber and poured forth heartfelt prayers to the heavenly Father. As he knelt he heard an unusual clamor and cawing and flapping of wings in the courtyard. He rose and went to see what was happening. A number of vultures and ravens common in that part of China were flying above him in great commotion and as he looked up a large piece of pork fell at his feet. Thankfully the old man picked up the unexpected food, saying, "My heavenly Father's kindness." Glancing around he saw a large piece of Indian meal bread dropped by another bird. Thus was old Li provided for by these feathered messengers of God as Elijah was in the cave.

* The International Sunday School Lesson for February 5, 1911. Elijah the prophet appears in Israel. 1. Kings 17: 1-16. GOLDEN TEXT: "They that seek the Lord shall not want any good thing." Ps. 34: 10.

Sunday School Lesson

The brook beside which Elijah tarried dried up and the ravens ceased to bring him food. Was God about to desert him and leave him to starve and to die? No, God gave him marching orders: "Arise, get thee to Zarephath; . . . behold, I have commanded a widow there to sustain thee." Truly she must be a rich widow! God did not say so. Elijah was accustomed to do as God told him, so he arose and went on a journey of ninety miles. No doubt he had some tender regrets about leaving the place where the Lord had so wonderfully sustained him. He had found sweet peace and comfort in that quiet spot.

God Finds a Friend for Elijah

Zarephath must have been a safe place for Elijah, otherwise God would not have sent him there. However, from a human point of view it could not be deemed a safe place, inasmuch as the father of Queen Jezebel had his residence there. God knew this, still he instructed Elijah to go, and Elijah went because he knew God was able to take care of him. He traveled on foot up the Jordan Valley, across the foothills of Lebanon to the shore of the Mediterranean. When at length he came to Zarephath he saw no rich widow's house into which he might enter—he only saw a poor woman gathering sticks to make a fire. Upon inquiry Elijah learned that this woman was a very poor widow, who had only a little oil and a little meal in her house, just enough to make bread once for herself and her little son, and none at all to give away to a stranger. Elijah told the woman that he was very hungry and requested her to knead the oil and meal into a cake that he might eat, at the same time assuring her that his God would always keep flour in her jar and oil in her cruse, enough for all of them as long as he should dwell under her roof. The woman must have been one who loved and trusted God after the manner of Elijah himself, for she went into the house, and taking all she had, prepared the food for Elijah. God recompensed her. The flour jar or the oil cruse was never empty while Elijah remained; they were never full, only just enough to suffice for the passing day.

Soon there came an occasion when God's pensioner on the widow's bounty was a great blessing to her. The little son was taken sick and died—she was called upon to bear a double load of grief, that of being a widow and that of being childless. God was watching, he had not deserted her, he knew her sorrow, and so in his goodness he gave Elijah the power to unloose the cords of death and bring back the child to life. When the woman told Elijah that her child was dead he commanded her, saying, "Give him to me." He took the dead child from the mother's arms and carried him to a room on the roof—the prophet's own chamber—and laid the little body on his own bed. Then stretching himself above the child he breathed into his nostrils, and prayed, saying, "O Jehovah, my God, I pray thee, let this child's soul animate the body again." His prayer was heard. The God who breathed into the first man the breath of life, did give life again to the widow's child. The boy arose from the bed, and Elijah took him, now dearer than ever, to his mother, who rejoiced and was exceeding happy that her dead had been brought back to life to comfort her.

What the Story Teaches

That our God is a living, personal, friendly God and not an impersonal force of nature. That in life as well as in death we stand before God. That we should yield unquestioning obedience to God, whether he says "Retreat" or "Go forward." That God is our hiding place and that only are we safe when in him. That God commands all creatures, using them for his service. That when one source of help fails, God supplies another. That God uses little things for great results. That giving money or service to God is no loss. "There is that which scattereth and yet increaseth." That we should believe, fear not, and do God's bidding. That God will supply all our needs.

"Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and all these things shall be added unto you."

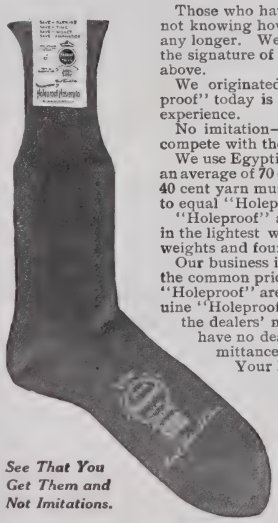
Advice to Stammerers

A READER of this journal, who has been a stammerer, writes this brief letter of advice to those who may be similarly afflicted:

"One who has stammered severely for many years desires to give his fellow-sufferers some good advice against being defrauded. He has attended quite a number of schools, and taken treatment from a number of persons who profess to cure stammering. In nearly all instances, such people make very extravagant claims. Some of them succeed in curing only a very few of the milder types of stammering, and give a certain amount of temporary relief to others. By this means they succeed in getting influential people to endorse their systems. The stammerer in search of a cure should always make the following demands of the school professing to cure: (1) If the school offers a guarantee, request that a copy of said guarantee be shown you before making payment. (2) Ask the principal to give you the names and addresses of some of his cured pupils in the town where the school is located, in order that you may talk with them in person before attending the school. (3) Ask that you may witness the exercises before making payment. (4) Ask those who endorse the school to give you the names and addresses of persons whom they know to be cured from having taken treatment at the school. (5) Take little stock in testimonials of the pen; always insist on hearing the cured person's testimonial."

Financial Advertisers

IN ANOTHER column we call attention to the disastrous failure of a well-known Trust Company in New York, which was followed by a momentary flurry of excitement on the part of depositors in a number of small banks. As soon as the failure was announced many of these depositors became afraid that they might lose their little hoard, and proceeded immediately to institute what is known as a run on their banks.



This incident, following so closely upon the heels of the Northern Bank failure, and on the apprehension of the "get-rich-quick" concerns which were raided by the United States postal authorities, illustrates the necessity for caution in the selection of investment propositions. As we have so often pointed out in our financial columns, the utmost discretion should be used before investing one's money with a concern about which very little is known. It is impossible to guarantee financial advertisements for the reason, as already explained in these columns, that the moral and legal liability would soon far outweigh our resources in case of failure. But we can and do exercise the greatest caution before accepting financial advertisements, which we believe to be as great a protection to our readers as is our guarantee, which applies to all advertisements of a non-financial character.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement.

Now on Every Pair of Genuine Holeproof Hose

Those who have failed to get genuine Holeproof Hose, not knowing how to identify them, need not be fooled any longer. We are now stamping all of our hose with the signature of Carl Freschl just as you see it written above.

We originated the guaranteed hose idea. "Holeproof" today is the result of 38 years of hose-making experience.

No imitation—no amateur make—can ever hope to compete with the leader.

We use Egyptian and Sea Island cotton yarn, costing an average of 70 cents per pound. Hose made with 30 or 40 cent yarn must be made coarse and unsightly in order to equal "Holeproof's" strength.

"Holeproof" are soft and attractive. They are made in the lightest weights. There are eleven colors, four weights and four grades, so you have the widest choice.

Our business is of such proportions that we can sell at the common price. Figuring the wear and the comfort, "Holeproof" are the cheapest hose ever made. The genuine "Holeproof" are sold in your town. We'll tell you the dealers' names on request or ship direct where we have no dealer, charges prepaid on receipt of remittance. Write for free book, "How to Make Your Feet Happy."

"The Clear Track"

Two men a thousand miles apart talk to each other by telephone without leaving their desks.

Two wires of copper form the track over which the talk travels from point to point throughout the continent.

Moving along one railroad at the same time are scores of trains carrying thousands of passengers. The telephone track must be clear from end to end to carry the voice of one customer.

The Bell system has more than ten million miles of wire and reaches over five million telephones. This system is operated by a force of one hundred thousand people and makes seven billion connections a year—twenty million "clear tracks" a day for the local and long distance communication of the American people.

The efficiency of the Bell system depends upon "One System, One Policy, Universal Service."

GONE HOME

GONE Home! there is a sound of resting
As weary lips pronounce the word,
Forever shielded from earth's tumult,
Forever "present with the Lord."

Gone Home! the battle strife is ended,
The arms are grounded at His feet;
Another victor waits the morning
When God's great host shall be complete.

Gone Home! while still we watch and wonder,
So prompt the message sent for thee;
We had no time to learn its meaning,
Ere thy bright spirit was set free.

Gone Home! while yet fond hearts were waiting
To hear more words of life and love
From lips that often told the story
Of Jesus and His home above.

Peter Muhlenberg Honored

THE esteem and affection which Americans, especially German-Americans, hold for the memory of the great pastor patriot, Peter Muhlenberg, have been typified in a handsome monument recently erected on the south side of the city hall, Philadelphia. The monument is in the form of a statue and is a fitting recognition of the services of a man who accomplished much not alone for his own co-religionists and countrymen, but for the people of Pennsylvania in general at a time when the country was passing through a momentous crisis.

When Muhlenberg and his father came to Pennsylvania there was spiritual destitution on all sides. They had mighty difficulties to contend against, but they were men of iron will, and with dauntless courage they persevered, emancipating men materially as well as spiritually.

Peter Muhlenberg went wherever he thought duty called, he did not spare himself, and he championed principle as well as religion. He inculcated the doctrine of sound living and impressed upon his hearers the sacredness of the home, for he knew that on the sanctity of the home was the future structure of nationhood to be raised. To the labors of such as he we owe the blessings we enjoy in free America to-day.

The State of Pennsylvania honors herself in honoring Peter Muhlenberg. In doing so she is testifying to the mighty part the German people and Muhlenberg's co-religionists had in laying strong and deep the foundation upon which she has erected her present prosperity.

Inspiring Poems for Boys

MANY letters come to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD asking advice concerning the best poetry for boys. Sometimes the inquirer is a mother who wishes to read aloud to her children; sometimes it is a compiler who is making up an anthology; oftener it is a teacher to whom falls the duty of interesting and instructing her youthful charges in the great poetry. It seems to be taken for granted by most of these inquirers that girls will naturally read and like poetry, but that boys are different.

A teacher writes: "For several years I have had my boys memorize: 'The Builders' (Longfellow); 'True Nobility' (Cary); 'When a Man Ain't Got a Cent' (Riley); 'Crossing the Bar' (Tennyson); 'Old Ironsides' and 'The Chambered Nautilus' (Holmes); 'The Two Opinions' (Field); extracts from 'The Present Crisis' and 'The Vision of Sir Launfal,' by Lowell, and Whittier's 'Eternal Goodness.' Please will you suggest ten other poems suitable for Eighth Grade boys to memorize?"

This is a hard task; but here are ten, of varying literary merit, but each containing some especial value for such boys: "Nathan Hale," by Francis M. Fitch; "Warren's Address," by John Pierpont; "Gradatim," by J. G. Holland; "The Destruction of Sennacherib," Lord Byron; "Amphion," Tennyson; R. T. S. Lowell's "Relief of Lucknow"; "Winstanley," by Jean Ingelow; "The Blind Men and the Elephant," by J. G. Saxe; "The Mountain and the Squirrel," by Emerson; "An Incident of the French Camp," by Robert Browning.

Some boys will disdain what to other boys may be charming, but for reading aloud in the family all are likely to enjoy Macaulay's ringing ballads of "Ivry," "Horatius" and "Naseby"; also, Browning's "Pied Piper" and "How They Brought the Good News."

There are plenty of verses of especial interest to boys from the pens of our newer writers, many of them not even yet placed between covers. Myrtle K. Cherryman's "Just a Man," "Out in Nature's Air" and "The Whole World Kin" contain a whole gospel of humanity; and the funny rhymes of James Whitcomb Riley, J. W. Foley and others of the same school, are often as full of philosophy as of fun.

Give the boys plenty of humor. They will love "The Walrus and the Carpenter," and others by Charles T. Dodgson; and "The Jumblies," with many more of the same sort, by Edward Lear.

Do not forget the precious hackneyed verses, which are so familiar to us older ones that we cannot appreciate the fact that they may seem new to the rising generation. One is fairly shocked to find, as one sometimes does, well-grown boys who have never thrilled under the tragic spell of "Casabianca," "Marco Bozzaris," "The Charge of the Light Brigade," "Hohenlinden," "Lochiel," or "Bernardo del Carpio."

Some of these possess small merit as poetry, but most of them contain lines which are full of something better than mere literary excellence.

Do not neglect to acquaint your boys with Shakespeare. Give them the passage about "A good name," from Othello; "The whole world is still deceived with ornament," and Portia's address on mercy, from "The Merchant of Venice"; Wolsey's "I charge you, Cromwell, fling away ambition," and many others. Search "Paradise Lost," "Comus," and Milton's other poems. Some lines in them sparkle with diamonds and rubies, and if rightly presented, will be loved by boys.

Go to the original sources. Hunt through the volumes of the great poets and the so-called "lesser" ones and select for yourself choice bits for your boys. You will often strike treasures, which only "bookworms" have ever enjoyed before. KATE UPSON CLARK.

Among the Workers

—MISSIONARY W. S. WILCOX, Phœnix, Natal, South Africa, writes that he is trying out a new industry—the raising of Sarvonica cotton and Soya beans—on the mission lands. Finances are insufficient to permit any experiment on a large scale. There is much need of a new native church and school-house for the mission.

—MRS. ALBERT WILSON, of Pleasant Valley, Mont., writes that Sunday School papers and lessons will be welcomed from readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to help a new Sunday School about to be started by Mrs. James Hammond. He writes: "No one has brought the Word of God to the people or children of this valley."

—W. E. BIEDERWOLF send a note regarding the report of his appearance at a recent boxing match at Akron, O., in which he writes: "I was asked by the president of the Athletic Club if I would like to preach to the 2,000 men who would be assembled there, and I saw nothing but an opportunity to reach the men with the words of Christ. It is my business to preach the Gospel. The invitation came through one of the most prominent and most devout ministers of the Gospel in the city, the Rev. J. O. Reagle, who was present while I preached. I did not stay for the contest. I did not pray for the boxers, save as I prayed for all the men in general. I told the men straight out that I did not believe in prize-fighting. I condemned in scathing language the gambler, the prize-fighter, the booze-fighter and all unholy sport, and preached the Gospel into them as hard as I knew how.

$100 Bonds—Yield up to 6%
Safe Investment For People of Small Means
Your savings should be made to bring in the greatest income consistent with safety.
In no other form of investment are these essential qualities so apparent as in bonds sold by reputable bankers and bond houses. Bonds sold by such houses are thoroughly examined and found to be well secured—before ever being offered for sale.
This house is thoroughly equipped for the examination of properties, maintaining its own legal, financial, and engineering departments, and purchases and offers for sale only those securities that meet the above requirements.
Not only have the executive officers of this company had years of experience in the financing of various propositions, but have also had more than a quarter of a century's success in the selection, construction and operation of electric railways, steam railroads, hydro-electric plants, and about forty profitable water works properties located in various cities in the United States.
The success of this house in the selection of securities is well attested by the fact that since its organization there has never been a day's delay in the payment of either principal or interest on any bond it has brought out.
Many people of small means are neglecting the opportunities for safe investment offered by approved $100 bonds. The small investor has looked upon owning bonds as rather beyond him—thinking only of bonds as being in $1000 denominations.
But $100 will buy a safe bond—paying up to 6% interest per annum—having the same security as those of large denominations.

CHEATED FOR YEARS
Prejudice Will Cheat Us Often If We Let It.
You will be astonished to find how largely you are influenced in every way by unreasoning prejudice. In many cases you will also find that the prejudice has swindled you, or rather, made you swindle yourself. A case in illustration:
"I have been a constant user of Grape-Nuts for nearly three years," says a correspondent, "and I am happy to say that I am well pleased with the result of the experiment, for such it has been.
"Seeing your advertisement in almost all of the periodicals, for a long time I looked upon it as a hoax. But after years of suffering with gaseous and bitter eructations from my stomach, together with more or less loss of appetite and flesh, I concluded to try Grape-Nuts food for a little time and note the result.
"I found it delicious, and it was not long till I began to experience the beneficial effects. My stomach resumed its normal state, the eructations and bitterness ceased and I have gained all my lost weight back.
"I am so well satisfied with the result that so long as I may live and retain my reason Grape-Nuts shall constitute quite a portion of my daily food."
Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."
Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Lincoln and Temperance

Abraham Lincoln

IT is eminently fitting that the popular pledge-signing movement of the day is named "Lincoln Legion." Lincoln was a total abstainer and an active temperance worker. His motto was to try to "pluck a thistle and plant a flower wherever a flower would grow." There could be no more noxious "thistle" than the liquor traffic; and so we find Lincoln, as one who loved his fellowman, opposing that great evil. He said, in 1853, "The most effectual remedy would be the passage of a law altogether abolishing the liquor traffic. There must be no more attempts to regulate the cancer; it must be eradicated."

His temperance principles were shown again when the committee called upon him to notify him of his nomination for President. It had been considered proper, and even necessary, to serve wine on such an occasion, and accordingly friends brought in wine and wine-glasses. Lincoln thanked them for their good intentions, but ordered the wine removed and water substituted, saying, "We will drink to the fortunes of our party in the best beverage ever brewed for man." And the morning before his assassination, April 14, 1865, he said to J. B. Merwin, "After reconstruction, the next great question will be the overthrow of the liquor traffic."

In 1846 Lincoln spoke on temperance at a log school-house near Springfield, Ill. He wrote and took to the meeting the following pledge, inviting the people to sign it:

"Whereas, the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage is productive of pauperism, degradation and crime; and believing that it is our duty to discourage that which produces more evil than good, we therefore pledge ourselves to abstain from the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage."

The Lincoln Legion invites the Sunday Schools of the nation to honor Lincoln's birthday by signing this Lincoln pledge on Sunday, February 12. Pastors, superintendents, and others interested, are invited to send for full information of this "Lincoln's Birthday Sunday School Service" to Rev. Howard H. Russell, general secretary of the Lincoln Legion, Box 1, Westerville, Franklin County, O.

A Great Spiritual Household

FAMILY ties are very endearing when home is what it should be. Thus nature forms the first family union. As the years come and go, time brings its changes, and unions are severed.

There are three words commencing with "d" that have much to do with disunion. They are "distance," "dissension" and "death." Distance leaves a vacancy in the home, dissensions alienate the affections, death breaks every human tie; but cannot destroy the hope of a final and everlasting reunion.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family is so large and of such a nature that a family reunion does not require to be conventional. Christianity is the same in spirit for all time and in all places. Distance does not divide affections or principles. Union with Christ brings fellowship with all his followers.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is the messenger of all Christians, like the herald angel which said to the humble shepherds: "Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people."

Dr. Adam Clark says in his comment on Acts 11: 26: "A Christian is the highest character which any human being can bear upon earth." In this connection we add, the Christian Church is the most sacred institution there is in existence. It cost more to redeem it from sin than to create the universe. The great apostle describes the Church in the most sublime language. Eph. 5: 25: "Christ also loved the Church, and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the Word, that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish." In its formative state, the Church is spotted with worldliness and sin, and sadly wrinkled with sectarianism.

Christ not only loved the Church with a love of pity in its depraved condition, but he also loved it with admiration for its possibilities, and with satisfaction for its final purity and ultimate glory. Great and good men have been raised up to serve the Church; but that is not a sufficient reason for naming the Church which Christ purchased with his own blood after a servant. Luther, Wesley and other great reformers would not have taken this honor to themselves. The apostle Paul recognized the Christian Church in domestic circles as well as in the larger assemblies. He mentions three homes where they had worship, which he greeted as the Church. He did not call them Priscillaists, nor did he say anything about Philemonism.

As children by birthright inherit the name of their parents, or as a bride should honor her husband by taking his name; so all who are Christians by spiritual birth and united to Christ by faith should honor him by bearing the Christian name.

Former editors of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD might have made it a personal enterprise by naming it after themselves; but they preferred to honor Christ by calling it definitely "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD," which gives us all a mutual and co-operative interest in its world-wide success. Though those godly men "rest from their labors, their works do follow them," and they are not missed as they would have been had not their mantle fallen on others of a like spirit.

Please allow one of the oldest members of this great family to suggest that a season of prayer be appointed for the family reunion of all the old and new subscribers, and the continued success of our common message-bearer, "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

A Woman Ordained as Pastor

THE first woman to be ordained into the Congregational ministry of Connecticut is Miss Marion H. Jones, of Hartford. She is also the first graduate of Smith College to become the pastor of a church. The ceremony took place on January 9, and the charge to the pastor was given by President Marion L. Burton, late pastor of the famous Church of the Pilgrims in Brooklyn. Miss Jones graduated from college in 1897, and has since that time performed much mission work in New York. Her post of duty is now at Staffordsville, Conn.

How Is Your Own Church?

things. No time, and not much desire, left for the proper work of a pastor

Membership of the church is a serious problem. Some are members because their parents were; some because they were baptized; some because they were confirmed; others because of worldly gain; others because it is respectable. The minister's plea is, "We must keep up the membership," forgetting the possibility of falling into sin by counting the people, and by sanctioning many of the devices to raise the necessary funds.

When an ordinary physician discovers the disease, he knows the remedy. Will he apply it? It means trouble at the beginning. Will he make the sacrifice? No more unconverted men for the ministry or for office in the Church. The ministry is not a profession, as is medicine or the law. No more fixtures for life, nor even for five years, except there be a fortnight Sunday interchange with another minister. More time with God and the Bible, and in visiting from house to house. "I seek not yours, but you! Give me souls or I die!"

Lindenhurst, L. I. EARNEST READER.

A Presbyterian Pastor's View

The outlook for extending the kingdom of God in this great agricultural country is very encouraging. Hundreds of young men and women are just reaching that period in life when they usually decide for or against Christ and the Church. Here are rare opportunities for winning souls for Christ, and along with the opportunity is linked grave responsibility, for if Christian people do not reap the great harvest that is ripening for the sickle, and by personal effort come in close touch, so that these sheaves may be gleaned for God, many of these young people whose lives may become efficient in service for the Master, will grope on in darkness, and their influence will be futile. The Presbyterian church is largely responsible for the salvation of a large area in this locality, since there are three established Presbyterian churches in the community, and no other denomination has come on this field. We virtually occupy the whole field. There are omens all along the line leading us to think our good, sturdy people are willing to assume the responsibility. With the help of the Master, we are urging every one to push the battle to the very gates, and already victory is crowning our efforts. In a three weeks' special campaign, one week each at three different churches, twenty-eight persons were converted and united with the people of God, and sixteen were baptized. Most of these were young men and women in the very prime of usefulness. We hope soon to be able to report one hundred conversions. REV. E. L. LATCHAW.

How Bible Class Work Helps

Stroudsburg is a town of 4,300 people, about three hours ride from New York City. A beautiful scenic country. Population mostly Americans. The M. E. Church is slowly gaining in membership, now numbering over 600. The Gospel is faithfully preached. Spiritually, we believe we are slowly progressive. The Adult Men's Bible Class is doing a great work in creating more interest in church work. If we can get the men interested the secret of the success of any church will be established. We have an attendance of 155 members in this class; less than two years ago the average attendance was less than 20. This shows what can be done by the men if they get enthusiastic and take an interest in the class. We have in this State over 34,000 members of Adult Bible Classes, an increase of 1,100 to 2,100. Notwithstanding this wonderful growth the whole thought and talk at our last State Convention was "Increase!" "Increase!" Let me urge every church to get its men busy in Bible Class work and this will help the Church in general. HARRY E. SWEENY.

Spiritual Condition Low

In answer to your request, I send the calendar for this month (January, 1911). We have a gymnasium in the church. Average attendance at prayer meeting from thirty to fifty. Church membership about 400; Sunday School in a flourishing condition; attendance from 350 to 400.

We are steadily gaining in membership. Our pastor is more expository than evangelical. I fear the spiritual life is low, especially among our young people. They seem more interested in entertainments of various kinds than vital godliness. They love to come to church, which is a good thing, if we could only get them more spiritually minded. I am an old subscriber to your paper, and, as you say, you have stood for the "old religion." We must keep the spiritual element uppermost, for there is our power, and only there. MEMBER.

Pawtucket, R. I.

A Church at a Standstill

The church with which I am connected is one of the smallest churches, if not the smallest, in the county. Its membership is forty, of whom twelve are non-resident (absent members). The average attendance at the morning Sabbath services is from thirty to forty, reaching occasionally to fifty. Fifty years ago, the average attendance was about sixty. The church is in a farming district, three and one-half miles from the nearest village. The population has decreased slowly but steadily during the last fifty years. As the old residents died—nearly all of whom were church-going people—the farms were sold and most of the newcomers cared nothing for church or religious things. This accounts largely for the falling off of church attendance.

The Gospel is faithfully preached every Sabbath. The present pastor has been with us since 1887, and preaches the pure, undefiled Gospel of Jesus Christ.

As to the spiritual condition, I cannot see any growth; neither can I say that there is any marked decay. Yet there ought to be growth. It is impossible to believe that we are at a complete standstill; but there have been no additions to the church the past year, and but few in the past five years, while there has been loss by death and removal, so that our membership is less than it was five years ago. There are among us a few active, devoted Christians who place Christ first in all their lives. Also there are others—altogether too many—who are members in name more than in service. And this is the case in all other churches with which I am acquainted. A MEMBER.

"Don't Bake Any Beans for Me"

Some thousands of men have said that to their wives after tasting a dish of Van Camp's. And a million more ought to say it. For the baking of beans is a long, hot task. It must be started sixteen hours in advance. And the result is a failure in any home oven if digestibility means anything at all.

The proper baking of beans in a home oven is utterly out of the question. Beans must be baked in live steam.

They need twice the heat that you ever get to the center of the home baking dish. That heat is required to break up the food particles so the digestive juices can act. Otherwise the beans, instead of digesting, ferment and form gas.

In the Van Camp kitchens the beans are baked in steam ovens, heated to 245 degrees. They are baked in small parcels so the full heat goes through. The beans are digestible.

They are baked without crisping, without bursting the skins. So the beans come out nut-like, mealy and whole.

They are baked with the tomato sauce, permeating every atom with a delicious zest. The result is the likable kind of baked beans.

These beans remain, until you open the can, exactly as they came from the oven. Not a savor is missing, not a flavor is changed.

The housewife keeps them on the pantry shelf, ready to serve in a minute. They become her most convenient meal.

When Van Camp's are used, baked beans become a very frequent dish. And beans are 84 per cent nutriment. They are richer than meat in food value, and cost but a third as much.

Doesn't it seem that every housewife would welcome such a dish?

"The National Dish" Van Camp's BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE PORK AND BEANS "The National Dish"

But get the right beans, else you'll be disappointed. Van Camp's are made of the whitest and plumpest Michican beans—beans all of one size. The sauce is made from whole tomatoes, ripened on the vines. We could buy dry beans for one-fourth what we pay. We could buy tomato sauce for one-fifth what ours costs. But the result of our way is a dish five times as good. When you once taste this dish you will insist on Van Camp's

The Fire Insurance Standard

THE fact that agents and brokers everywhere are pushing other companies with the argument that they are "just as good as the Hartford," shows that a Hartford policy has become the standard fire insurance policy of America. When that policy, by which other companies are measured, can be had without extra cost, is it not wisdom to insist on having the standard policy itself?

That the Hartford has become the standard is because

1. It does the largest business.
2. It has paid the biggest losses.
3. Its assets and surplus are larger than ever.
4. It is more than 100 years old.
5. It is the best known company.
6. It is fair in settlements.
7. It is prompt in payment.

When you need fire insurance ask your agent or broker to get you a policy in the Hartford. If he tells you he can get you a policy "just as good as the Hartford," ask him why you cannot have the Hartford. Sometimes it may take a little effort, but you can get what you want if you

AGENTS EVERYWHERE

Here's the Opportunity for You and Yours to Make a Good Living in the Poultry Business!

"It really seems too good to be true—that we might carry out our heart's desire and raise poultry for profit even though we had no farm." This is what one person wrote us who has been successful with the Philo System of Poultry-Keeping.

Note the condition of these pullets. These pullets and their ancestors for seven generations have never been allowed to run outside the coops

The originator of this system has discovered that a large amount of land is not necessary, so that now the social disadvantage of living miles from your friends, neighbors, and the social and educational advantages of the town is no longer necessary. There is no reason why any intelligent man or woman should not be able to make a comfortable living—and something besides—from a modern Philo System poultry plant.

The Philo System is Unlike All Other Ways of Keeping Poultry and in many respects just the reverse, accomplishing things in poultry work that have always been considered impossible, and getting unheard-of results that are hard to believe without seeing.

The New System Covers All Branches of the Work Necessary for Success from selecting the breeders to marketing the product. It tells how to get eggs that will hatch, how to hatch nearly every egg and how to raise nearly all the chicks hatched. It gives complete plans in detail how to make everything necessary to run the business and at less than half the cost required to handle the poultry business in any other manner.

Two-Pound Broilers in Eight Weeks are raised in a space of less than a square foot to the broiler, and the broilers are of the very best quality, bringing here 3 cents a pound above the highest market price.

Our Six-month-old Pullets Are Laying at the Rate of 24 Eggs Each per Month in a space of two square feet for each bird. No green cut bone of any description is fed, and the food used is inexpensive as compared with food others are using.

Our new book, The Philo System of Poultry Keeping, gives full particulars regarding these wonderful discoveries, with simple, easy-to-understand directions that are right to the point, and 15 pages of illustrations showing all branches of the work from start to finish.

Don't Let the Chicks Die in the Shell

One of the secrets of success is to save all the chickens that are fully developed at hatching time, whether they can crack the shell or not. It is a simple trick and believed to be the secret of the ancient Egyptians and Chinese, which enabled them to sell the chicks at 10 cents a dozen.

Chicken Feed at 15 Cents a Bushel

Our book tells how to make the best green food with but little trouble and have a good supply any day in the year, winter or summer. It is just as impossible to get a large egg yield without green food as it is to keep a cow without hay or fodder.

Our New Brooder Saves 2 Cents on Each Chicken

No lamps required. No danger of chilling, overheating or burning up the chickens as with brooders using lamps or any kind of fire. They also keep the lice off the chickens automatically or kill any that may be on them when placed in the brooder. Our book gives full plans and the right to make and use them. One can easily be made in an hour at a cost of 25 to 50 cents.

Used and endorsed by over 300,000 poultrymen and all the leading poultry editors, experiment stations, etc.

SPECIAL OFFER.—Send $1.00 for one year's subscription to the Poultry Review, a monthly magazine devoted to progressive methods of poultry-keeping, and we will include without charge a copy of the latest edition of the Philo System Book.

To Honor Dr. Klopsch's Memory

A PLAN TO ENDOW MONT-LAWN

Her Own and Her Sister's Baggage

THE idea of making Mont-Lawn a Memorial to Dr. Klopsch seems to have met with unanimous approval and we have been fairly deluged with letters like those printed below. Of course none of our correspondents at the time of writing had received last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in which was outlined the plan for endowing Mont-Lawn. And so a great many asked us to suggest some way in which this object could be accomplished. But by this time they will have read how it is proposed to make March 7, the anniversary of Dr. Klopsch's death, the great Rally Day for the Children's Home Endowment.

We cannot too forcibly remind our readers of this opportunity to show their allegiance to the memory of Dr. Klopsch by beginning at once to interest their friends, and by so doing securing the greatest possible amount of money for the Fund. Do not forget that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD desires to do its part, and that it has pledged itself to give to the Endowment Fund half of all subscription money received from January 25 to and including March 7. This offer does not exclude your right to take advantage of premiums or magazine combinations.

It should not be difficult for every one of our subscribers to secure the aid of at least one friend. If they do, it will mean $225,000 for the fund, an assurance of a perpetual memorial to Dr. Klopsch and an annual outing for the children of the slums.

If you can influence more than one friend, so much the better. If you can get ten friends to help you, sending us $15 for ten subscriptions, thereby contributing $7.50 toward the Endowment of the Children's Home, you will be recognized as a Patron and your name will be inscribed upon a memorial tablet on the inner wall of the Children's Temple, where Dr. Klopsch for fifteen years delighted thousands of little ones.

EXPRESSIONS OF APPROVAL FROM OUR READERS

SOUTH NORWALK, CONN., January 13, 1911.
TO THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I have received the Calendar and the photogravure of Dr. Klopsch, which I prize very much. His Life Work was grand. Why he was taken away from us when he was doing so noble a work only our heavenly Father, who doeth all things well, knows. His great heart reached to every land. His work on the beautiful Hudson to which he gave the name of the Children's Paradise of Mont-Lawn, should live on, a monument to his memory, and should be remembered by the whole CHRISTIAN HERALD Family.

MRS. M. A. GRIFFITH.

BALTIMORE, MD., January 10, 1911.
DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I have received the portrait of that good man Dr. Klopsch, and I hope that Mont-Lawn, the place he loved so much, will be his monument.

Sincerely yours,
ISAAC F. DAY.

CRETE, NEB., January 11, 1911.
TO THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

J. S. H. strikes a sympathetic chord in his article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 11, suggesting a Memorial Fund in memory of Dr. Klopsch at Mont-Lawn. I have little faith in monuments of stone. Hospitals, schools, missions are all better monuments to perpetuate the name and memory. I am sure that many of your readers will be glad to assist an enterprise of the kind suggested.

Yours truly,
E. F. STEPHENS.

LEXINGTON, KY., January 14, 1911.
DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I have received your great book, Life Work of Louis Klopsch. I read it through in three days. I can say he was the greatest and best man for Christ and the children of Mont-Lawn. I say, let Mont-Lawn be his monument.

Yours sincerely,
MRS. L. ALBERTS.

A Memorial to Louis Klopsch

By Margaret E. Sangster

THERE'S a Children's Temple at fair Mont-Lawn,
Where the little ones meet and sing,
Sweet as the notes of the birds at dawn,
To the praise of the Heavenly King.
They listen there to the Word of God,
And they fold their hands in prayer.
They are led in the path that the Master trod,
And the Master blesses them there.

From the dirt and din of the city street,
From the tenements close and dark,
Comes the hurrying tramp of the little feet,
To Mont-Lawn as a sheltering ark.
Into the midst of summer flowers
To the meadows gay with bloom,
The children haste for enchanted hours,
A rift in their life of gloom.

Think of them sleeping in clean, white beds,
While the steadfast stars peep in.
Think of the dreams in the little heads
Which the happy fairies spin.
Watch them busy at work and play,
And at breakfast, dinner and tea;
Merry, and hungry thrice a day,
A sight it is good to see.

A year has fled since the children's friend
Was called to the home above;
To the beautiful life that hath no end,
To the home of the perfect Love;
The generous heart and the open hand,
The brain that was quick to plan
For the poor and needy of every land,
Gone from the sight of man.

He cared for the children at fair Mont-Lawn;
Let them keep his memory green,
While the summer eve and the summer dawn
Are bright in their crystal sheen.
A year has gone since he passed away;
In many a year to come
Let the city's children sing and play
In his beautiful Children's Home.

PICKEREL LAKE, ONT., January 14, 1911.
DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD:

You have asked for opinions in regard to erecting a monument to the late dearly beloved Dr. Louis Klopsch. I would say, erect no monument of marble or other stone, but take what it would cost to build a monument, and put it into Mont-Lawn. Hundreds of thousands of people can see and feel the good of that every day, where if it was a monument of stone, only a few thousand would be privileged to see it. So long as Mont-Lawn and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are in existence our dear brother will never be forgotten. He is dead, but his works live on. May God ever bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is my prayer.

From your ever well-wishing subscriber,
T. A. BUDREAU.

CEDAR FALLS, IOWA, January 10, 1911.
TO THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

In your late issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the plan to fittingly remember the great life work of the beloved Dr. Klopsch by endowing the Children's Paradise, meets my approval. What greater privilege could we ask than to have the chance to give our mite in this memorial serving two purposes—commemorating the memory of Dr. Klopsch, and making the great work which he founded a permanent institution for all time?

Sincerely yours,
W. G. MOORHEAD.

DEAR SIR:

I have been a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for fifteen years, and have learned to love it and its late Editor. I say by all means we ought to raise a monument to his name for the good he has done for humanity's sake.

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I think Mont-Lawn should be perpetuated to the memory of Dr. Klopsch. MRS. H. DYE.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A VISIT TO MONT-LAWN

ONE day in summer I was hurrying from the Bible House in New York City, when, just as I reached the outer door, I came upon a disconsolate group of four or five little children. There was such a sad droop to their little shoulders and their faces were so sober that I stopped to inquire the cause. The tallest of the girls turned to me quickly.

"Oh, do you know Dr. Klopsch?" she asked eagerly. Being told that I did, she caught my dress in her hands in her eagerness.

"Oh, won't you go and see him for us?" she pleaded. "We want to go to Mont-Lawn so bad, and the man up stairs says they have the names of all the children they can take to Mont-Lawn for the rest of this summer and that we can't go. We want to go so bad. My brother Tom's been to Mont-Lawn, and he says if we could tell Dr. Klopsch about it he'd let us go. Brother Tom saw Dr. Klopsch ever so many times at Mont-Lawn, and he says that he is so good and kind, that he loves every poor little boy and girl on the East Side. Oh, he says Dr. Klopsch would do anything for poor people. Won't you go ask him if we can't go to Mont-Lawn?"

The little maid was right. I thought of it when the dreadful news came to us from the hospital that the Doctor could live but a few hours. "The children of the East Side are losing their best friend," said one, as the sad message was repeated.

Little Waifs on the Street

How well I remember the days I spent at Mont-Lawn last summer, that beautiful vacation home on the Hudson for the little tenement children of the great East Side of New York, which the Doctor's generous heart brought into existence! How those children cheered and clapped whenever they saw the wagon coming which brought Dr. Klopsch to Mont-Lawn! I remember we were going through the dining-room one noon, when the children were eating dinner. A tiny hunchback boy—"Little Tim" they called him—had gotten to a table where the bench was too low for him to sit and eat; so he was standing in his place, contentedly munching pie, when the Doctor's quick eye spied him.

"Here, Little Tim mustn't have to stand when he eats!" cried the Doctor. "Get up there, boys, and bring over this higher bench," pointing to one by a window. In a moment the change was made, he had lifted Little Tim to a comfortable seat, and was passing on to see if any one else needed a lift.

Yes, Mont-Lawn with its living memories of his love for little children ought surely to be his memorial.

THE AWAKENING OF PERSIA

By FELIX J. KOCH

THE increasing interest in Persia, taken, first of all, by Great Britain and later by Russia, Germany and other nations, and the pending changes there are attracting the attention of the world to one of the oldest and most interesting countries in existence. In the last few years, Persia has loomed up in the public eye largely, owing to a railway projected there by German capital.

To the traveler, the whole country is full of picturesque attractions. Entering the Persian Gulf, one sees first the pearl islands of Bahrein. These are the source of the pearl supply for the caravans from the East. These islands are held by a number of small Arab tribes. At different times, the Egyptians and the Persians have owned them. To-day, the Utobe tribe holds the islands, which are practically a British protectorate. Britain years ago put an end to slavery and piracy in the Persian Gulf, as her commerce in that region was at the mercy of freebooters. England has been urged to annex these islands, but she would rather control, and since 1815 there has been a British resident there, who is the real ruler.

In 1867 the reigning sheik was set aside, and was exiled to the mainland by England. In 1880, a treaty was concluded by Great Britain with Bahrein, the chief agreeing not to grant a coaling-station to any other power, nor to receive consuls nor make treaties with any nation excepting with the English. In 1892 the treaty was amended to prevent Bahrein from alienating territory, save with England's consent.

The chief value of the islands is in the pearl fisheries and in the fact that they have one of the few really good harbors in the gulf. The principal town is Mananeh, the metropolis of the little archipelago, which has perhaps sixty thousand souls. Bahrein Island itself is twenty-five miles long by ten in width. In a single year, its export of pearls is over $2,500,000. The only other notable export of the island is donkeys!

As to revenues, the Sultan of Bahrein levies a five per cent. customs duty; he taxes the pearl fishery boats, and he makes money by endless lawsuits, for the Arabs are inordinately fond of litigation. The English resident at Bahrein has an agreement with the Arab chiefs on the islands, not to make war by water, though they may do so by land. This is arranged so as not to destroy the pearl trade.

Proceeding farther up the Persian Gulf, the traveler coasts the desert, which extends to the very water's edge. There are few important tribes until one comes to the Gulf of Kovite, or "The Grain," with the town of Kovite on the south side of the harbor. This is the projected terminus of the Bagdad and Gulf Railway, and is a town of between ten and twenty thousand population. Four thousand of the people are sailors. All are under the rule of the Sheik of Kovite. There formerly existed near at hand a number of unimportant Arab tribes of whom the Sheik of Kovite exacted toll when they came to the coast. The present ruler, Moubarek (who obtained his place by assassinating his predecessor), began a career of conquest inland. He became embroiled with the kingdom of Mezd, to which there were two or three claimants, one of whom rallied his forces to attack Kovite, and secure it, as it is a splendid deep-water harbor near the head of the gulf. That affair in 1901 resulted in the sending of a British fleet to "The Grain," opposite Kovite, to protect the town, and, incidentally, to prevent its being made the terminus of the Bagdad Railway, as Turkey desires, unless it should be assured that the railway would run on English terms, England having ninety per cent. of the entire commerce of the gulf. Things have come to a standstill

Prerequisites to a Revival

An Appropriate Sermon for the Times, by the Late Dwight L. Moody*

This is the tenth of twenty remarkable sermons by Moody, never before published, and the existence of which was disclosed only a few months ago. The absolute authenticity of the sermons is vouched for by the evangelist's son, Wm. R. Moody, who cordially approves their publication in this paper. The sermons are the exclusive property of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. One will appear each month.

I WANT to call your attention to some qualifications a man or woman needs to be a worker for God. The first and most important is faith. If you will read the lives of those that have been eminent in God's service you will find they have always been men of faith. Abraham was a man of faith. Consider how he lived his years relying on divine guidance. Moses, a man of faith, looking up to God for inspiration to speak and act aright. If we are going to do a work for God, we must have faith. I like to meet a man that believes and knows what he believes. I get weary of one who is living on negations. I want a man to believe something and cling to it. I have respect for the man who does not believe as I do, but who stands on his two feet and fights it out on that line. Faith is a good thing to have—not only to believe that God can use the ministers of the Gospel (that's a kind of faith most anybody can have) but faith to believe that he can and will use you and me—the humblest amongst us—to carry out his own designs and intentions. That's another kind of faith.

Dwight L. Moody

"Knowing" and "Believing"

I heard a Scotchman, away back in '73, make this remark, and it burned down into my soul: "that there wasn't a man in all Saul's army but knew that God could use him, and one believed that God would use him, and he went out and slew Goliath. There's a difference. David had faith to believe that God would use him. It is the miserable unbelief that's keeping back the people—keeping back the blessing. When Moses sent out the twelve spies, mark where he made his mistake. It was on account of the hardness of their hearts. God told him he would take them into the Promised Land. That was enough; it was a good land, "flowing with milk and honey." Moses didn't send out the spies to see if the Almighty told the truth; he relied upon the Divine promise. Suppose the twelve men had been representative men, the best the tribes had, and had brought back a minority and a majority report, all admitting that what God said was true, but ten of them doubting and adding to their report, "But we saw giants, and saw the sons of Anak there, and solid cities walled up to heaven, and we are not able to go up and take the land."

Send out twelve men now, and they will bring back just such a report. Send out twelve officers of the church, and ten of them will throw cold water on any movement that makes a suggestion to "go forward." They will say: "Now, brethren, we want to be very cautious. You know a few years ago we started something and failed. We ought to be very cautious. It would be a mistake to have a series of meetings and not have them succeed. We are not ready as yet for the undertaking." Not ready! There may be one or two of the twelve who will say, "We are well able to go up and possess the land. If God be with us, we can go." I can see those twelve men in the camp, and the crowds surging around them. I believe some people like to believe a lie. "A lie will go half-way round the world before truth will get its boots on to contradict it." The lie went through the camp like wildfire. The representative men, the elders, the leading men of the tribes, said, "We aren't able to go up and take the land," and suggested going back to Egypt. I see a few godly old saints gathering around Caleb and Joshua, and saying, as Caleb said, "We are able to go up and take this land." But others said, "We are not able. The land through which we have passed is a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof; the men are of great stature, and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so were we in theirs."

The Conquering Power of Faith

I see one man coming, full of unbelief, addressing Caleb, saying, "What are you talking about? I heard those ten men over there and they said they were like grasshoppers in the sight of those other men; and how do you stand up and dare to look into the faces of those ten?" Just see how unreasonable unbelief is. The land is so poor that it "eateth up the inhabitants," and yet is "full of giants." That's about as consistent as unbelief is. Not able to go up and take the land! And they turned back and wandered in the wilderness forty years, when they might have easily taken possession of the place in forty days. The Church of God can get out of the wilderness if we have faith.

If you have no faith, then you are looking back, or you are looking up at the giants, and they look very big. The saloons and haunts of vice are nothing, if the Church of God rises in its strength; we could soon sweep these things out of the way. We want faith—faith that the world can see. Some say that you can't see faith. God can. I see a drunken man down here who has been converted. That man had faith. Get a few hundred people like that, and see if the world don't travel on the right path. People complain because they "can't get it." If you have any unconverted, exercise faith, and say: "O God, bless this man," or "this woman." Let's work together and see if we can't get this people into the kingdom of God.

Another thing, with faith, is courage. What we want is courage to speak out our convictions. I believe the reason why so many men fight the Lord's work is that they are afraid of public opinion. Know that you are right, and then go ahead. A man told me some time ago that he started a good work, but a newspaper wrote an article against it and he got discouraged and gave it all up. The idea of letting a newspaper stop him! People used to be tied to the stake and burned for not giving up their convictions. If you see sin, smite it! What you want is courage to speak out your convictions. If it's right, stand by it! If it's wrong, fight it! Four times in the first chapter of Joshua, God tells Joshua to be of good courage. I don't believe God uses a man that hasn't courage; a man that's a coward isn't fit for God's service! If the Spirit of God tells you to go to speak to a man, go and speak; never mind whether the man likes it or not. If the Spirit of God urges you to go and visit some poor woman—some unfortunate woman—don't be afraid to take your Bible and tell her the Way of Life. Have moral courage to live up to the promptings of the Spirit. Never mind public sentiment. It's right to work for God.

The Value of Spiritual Enthusiasm

Is there a better work on earth than to let young men speak to young men? These young men can reach young men better than the ministers themselves. One of the regrets of my life is that I cannot reach the young men, as when I was one with them; and if you are going to reach them while in the colleges and seminaries, do it now. You've no time to lose. They can be won to Christ. Read in Joshua: "Meditate on the word day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then shalt thou make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success." No one could stand before that hero of faith, because he had courage. He got into the Promised Land. We find him walking around the walls of Jericho, "marking well the bulwarks," then one came and stood over him with a drawn sword. If he had been a coward, he would have said, "I left my sword in the tent," but instead he inquired: "Art thou for us or for our adversaries?" "No. I am Captain of the Lord's Host, to lead you on to victory." If Joshua had been a coward, God wouldn't have given him that kind of a test. May God fill us with courage and boldness to speak for Christ!

Another thing that many are afraid of is enthusiasm. Do you know what that means? I will tell you: "In God." That's what it means. I would to God we had a thousand times more enthusiasm than we've got. I love holy enthusiasm; it's a great thing to have! During our war, there were certain men whose names were worth more than an army of ten thousand men. Why? Because there was a sort of enthusiasm that carried everything by storm.

I did like the enthusiasm of that Italian patriot, Garibaldi, and I never saw anything in the papers about him that I didn't read. They threw him into prison, but he wrote, "If fifty Garibaldis are thrown into prison, let Rome be free!" He didn't care for Garibaldi, and that was the reason he rose above the other men of his time. His mind was fired with enthusiasm.

There's a story told of a certain general who came up against a great army of 30,000 men, and he had only 500. When the commander with 30,000 men heard that his opponent had only 500, he sent word to him that if he would surrender he would spare his life. But the general, in the presence of the man bringing the offer, called a young man of his army, and told him to take a dagger and press it to his own heart. He did so and died. Then he called to another man and said, "Leap into that chasm." He did so, and was dashed to pieces on the rocks below. "Go back," said the general to the commissioner, "and tell your commander what you have seen. Tell your king I have 500 just such men. Tell your king we'll die, but we'll not surrender! Tell your king I will chain him with my troops in forty-eight hours." And inside of forty-eight hours he routed that great army and had that king chained with fetters. That's recorded in history. Whether it's true or not, I don't know. "But one shall chase a thousand, and two shall put ten thousand to flight." A man full of the fire of enthusiasm is worth a thousand other men at any time.

How would you count Paul? Wouldn't he outweigh the whole of us? That little tent-maker of Tarsus! Would to God that we had more like him here now—men to stand up and be full of enthusiasm. Do you tell me that man wasn't full of enthusiasm?

Encouragement and Perseverance

I read some time ago of a fire from which it was thought all the people had escaped; but a little child was seen to put its head out of a fifth-story window and cry for help. The child was in great peril. A ladder was run up, but the flames came bursting out of the windows. The bold fireman began to waver, but some one cried in the street, "Let's cheer him," and cheer upon cheer went up, and the fireman thus encouraged got that child and brought it down. Man! If you can't work for God, cheer on the rest! Don't be croaking and grumbling. If you can't stand the heat and burden of the day, don't go in among the croakers and find fault.

We have now considered three virtues—faith, courage, enthusiasm. The next is perseverance! Spurgeon used to call it Sticktoitiveness. That's what we want. If we don't succeed to-day, we'll get at it all the harder to-morrow; and if we don't get it then we'll go at it the next day and every day of the week. If we don't succeed in January, we'll go at it in March, and if not in March, in April, and have no let-up in summer. There's no calendar in heaven. The gates of heaven are open every day in the week and every night. We want men and women who have perseverance.

I have great admiration for the four men at Capernaum who brought the man to Christ. When they were going up from Jerusalem to look into the philosophy of this great revival in Capernaum, and the house was filled, and the folks were out on the streets and couldn't get in, the power of the Lord was present to heal them. But it doesn't say they were healed. I've got so tired of the modern philosophy. They are always looking "at the philosophy" of a thing. Some one will be writing of "the philosophy of revivals" by and by.

Having Faith for Others

But while these men were talking about the thing, and thinking about it—Christ standing there and not one of the crowd believing—down came four men, filled with the Spirit. I hear one say, "I had a withered arm, and he healed me." Another said, "I was a lame man, and I can walk now." A third said, "You know I was a leper, and he healed me of my leprosy." And the fourth had been also blessed. I don't know that the palsied man they brought to Christ had any faith. The three evangelists give an account of that man, and not one of them tells us that he had faith. These four men had faith for him. Let us have faith for sinners; let us have faith for them. Let us go and fetch them; get them under the sound of the Gospel.

These four men come marching down the street; four men at work. They're all different, yet united—just as though one might be a Presbyterian, another a Methodist, another a Baptist, and the fourth a Congregationalist, and they had this palsied man and they brought him to Christ. And when they got to where Christ was, the doorways were all filled. I can imagine they had a litter, and were outside down on the sidewalk. One of the men steps right up to the door, and stands right in the doorway. He says to the next man, "Won't you step out of the way for us to bring in this litter?" "Indeed I won't," is the reply. "I've come forty miles, and yet I can't see him." Then he speaks to a woman —"Madam, won't you let us in? Stand aside, and let us get this sick man to Christ?" And she says, "No, indeed I won't. I never have heard him before in my life, and I want to hear him." And they couldn't get that palsied man in.

Now, I believe, if they had been Americans, they would have taken the man back home. "He's got to get to him that way or no way," they would say. "The door is made to bring people in by." One of the men stands up on the window-sill, and he says, "What shall we do?" "We must get this man in some way. There's such a crowd here, and we must get that man to Christ some way. I've got a plan that will work: Let us go to the next-door neighbor and borrow his stairs, and get this sick man up onto the roof." "What'll you do there, then?" "Why, tear a hole in the roof, and let him down!" Wouldn't that shock a modern audience? Tear up the roof! Yes. Spoil a building! I don't know what would happen. Tear up a man's roof!

Now, they've got him up on the roof, and now they've let him down on the philosophizers' heads. I see them puffing and lugging the bed. Some man there says, "Why didn't they bring him through the door? I like things done decently and in order. I don't like these things so out of order. No, I don't." That's what people have to say now. "Why not go to the churches?" The churches are open an hour or two a week, and when they are open, they are afraid of people wearing out the carpets or carrying off the hymn-books. Why do you laugh? I'm dealing in facts.

These four people got a hole made in the roof, and big enough, too. They tied ropes to the ends of the litter and down it came. I tell you, the philosophizers had to get out of the way, or it would have come down on their heads! They laid him right at the feet of Christ. Did Christ frown on them? Did he look at them and say, "Is it possible that you should dare tear up the roof of this man's house?" He was pleased when he saw their faith. He said, "Son, be of good cheer; thy sins are forgiven thee." The men rest on their faith, to see what would take place. Something will happen if you bring your friends to Christ. I hear one of the men say, "Do you hear that?" "I couldn't hear it." "Why, he said that man's sins are all forgiven—all forgiven—from the cradle to this hour." Perhaps it was his sins that brought on his palsy. Ah, your friends will get a good deal more than you think when you bring them to Christ!

And they who were standing around said, "Who is this that forgives sins? This is a blasphemer!" Christ could read their thoughts as easily as you and I can read a book. And he said, "Is it easier to say to the sick of the palsy, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, and take up thy bed, and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins, (he saith to the sick of the palsy) I say unto thee, Arise, and take up thy bed, and go thy way into thine house." And the man leaped to his feet, and rolled up that bed, and went out of the door home.

Now, these four men had done a good day's work. Nineteen hundred years have rolled away, and that story has been told all these years. Can't you find some palsied man—some one sick with sin—and bring him to the Son of God? Get him. Get him some way. Make up your mind you're going to do it. Have you got Faith, Courage, Enthusiasm, and will you Persevere? If you will, thank God. May we be fired with the fire coming down from heaven.

THE PRINTER'S DEVIL

By Rev. J. M. FARRAR, D.D.*

"MAMMA has an old Elbib Library. She is going to give it to me for my little book-shelf." That is very kind of mamma, but I hope you will get a brand new edition. I am quite sure mamma will ask papa to buy it for you. You are young and have many years to live. Get a new Elbib so that it will last as long as you live without breaking and dropping out the leaves. Get large print so that you can read it when you are old. I have an Elbib Library that was given to me when a boy. After reading it for forty years and carrying it with me when I went away from home, its back began to break and its leaves to fall out. Get a binding that will never break and that will always hold the leaves.

THEN there is something else I want you to think about before getting your new Elbib. A number of different printers have published this library, but they have not all published it in the same way. Have you ever heard of the "Printer's Devil"? He is not a bad boy, but just because he is a boy the printers blame him for their mistakes and give him a bad name. Each set of books is called an "edition." Shall I tell you how some of the printers, not the printer's boy, sent out the books? One edition is called the "Wicked Elbib." In the Ten Commandments the printer left out the little word "not." The commandments then read: "Thou shalt kill." "Thou shalt covet." "Thou shalt bear false witness." Be very careful not to put that "wicked Elbib" on your little shelf.

THERE is another edition that is called the "Vinegar Edition." Christ gave us the parable of the vineyard. The printer made it read: "The parable of the vinegar." I once knew a boy who had a sour face. He always looked cross and sour and no one liked him. I am afraid he read the vinegar edition. There is another one called the "Placemakers Edition." Christ said: "Blessed are the Peacemakers." The printer made it read: "Blessed are the Placemakers." Some boys and girls, I very much fear, have this edition. If they cannot have the best place on May Day they will not parade. If they cannot have the best chair in the Sunday School they will not stay in the class. If they can't have their place at the table they will not enjoy the meal. Be careful about the Placemakers edition. There is still another one that is called the "Reverence Edition." This book was printed with references. On the margin of each leaf there was a reference telling where to find the same passage, or one like it, in one or more of the other books. A reference Elbib is very valuable. But the printer instead of printing reference made it rererence. There are some people who have this edition and they reverence the Elbib so much that they are almost afraid to read it. Now I want you to reverence your Elbib Library, but do not reverence it so much that you will be afraid to use it. I once knew a man who kept his Elbib in a glass case. He would have fought with any man who said anything against it. But this man would come home drunk and break up everything in the room, except the glass case in which he kept this Library. If he had put the Elbib on a shelf and read it every day he would have been a better man.

Do not be led away by these errors.

YOU want a story! Here is one told by a lawyer. One evening he received a message from the prison that two young men who had been arrested wanted him to defend them. The police believed that these boys were burglars. The lawyer was impressed by the frank open manner of the boys, who told him that they were honest. They said that it would break the hearts of their parents to know that such a disgraceful charge was made against them. The young men were searched carefully and nothing was found but a Bible and a child's picture. On the Bible were some little hooks and wires that seemed to be used for hanging up the picture. When the lawyer found that they had their Bible with them he said he would defend them. He made a very strong speech to the jury, and told them that any one who loved a child's picture and carried it in his Bible could not be a thief. When the young men were free they came to the lawyer and asked for the Bible and the picture. The lawyer said he would never tell any one if they would tell him all about their lives. Imagine the surprise of the lawyer. They opened the thick cover of the Bible and revealed a set of delicate saws and files. They showed him that the hooks and wires could be bent into keys of any size to open doors and locks. What looked like a Bible was used in order to keep people from thinking they were robbers. They just made believe that they had an Elbib Library, knowing that people would trust them if they believed they loved these wonderful books. They had the Hypocrite Edition of our Elbib Library.

And we, if we aright would learn
The wisdom it imparts,
Must to its heavenly teaching turn
With simple, childlike hearts!

Gethsemane

IN GOLDEN youth, when seems the earth
A summer land for singing mirth,
When souls are glad and hearts are light
And not a shadow lurks in sight,
We do not know it, but there lies
Somewhere, veiled under evening skies,
A garden each must some time see,
Gethsemane, Gethsemane,
Somewhere his own Gethsemane.

Down shadowy lanes, across strange streams,
Bridged over by our broken dreams,
Behind the misty cape of years,
Close to the great salt font of tears
The garden lies; strive as you may
You cannot miss it in your way.
All paths that have been or shall be Pass somewhere through Gethsemane.

All those who journey, soon or late
Must pass within the garden's gate;
Must kneel alone in darkness there
And battle with some fierce despair.
God pity those who cannot say—
"Not mine, but Thine"; who only pray,
"Let this cup pass," and cannot see
The purpose in Gethsemane.
Gethsemane, Gethsemane,
God help us through Gethsemane!

Force of Habit

SOME one has said that habit, at its inception, is like a tiny silken thread, easily severed, but practised, it becomes a cord of steel that requires all the mental and physical force of our being to break asunder.

You can see this truth exemplified in our daily lives. If courtesy and gentility are practised in early life, they become a fixed habit in later years with those with whom we come in daily contact, at home or elsewhere. How easily practised and carried out are these noble and character-building determinations, founded in earlier years. Such lives cannot but have their impress upon the lives and acts of our companions and associates. Did we always stop to consider the force of habit and the power of the influence we wield in all that tends to build up the physical, moral and spiritual structure, we would better understand our responsibilities.

There are many crossings to pass, many boulders to cast aside, many unpleasant encounters, many knotty problems to solve, and how well we meet and dispose of them will depend upon the force of our early training and habits. It is ours not to live for self alone, but to assist others on to a solid foundation built of other than hay, wood, or stubble, that they, too, may build with such security that the storms of opposition and the breathings of the adversary cannot move them from their moorings. Bear with you a smiling face and benign disposition, and your conscience will be clearer and your rest sweeter. What we are in after life will depend in great measure on what we were and what our training was in our childhood.

"Loves the Paper Dearly"

The premium book was received and also the Calendar and photograph of Dr. Klopsch. Many, many thanks for the same. This is the third year I have been a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family. I love the paper dearly, read it and enjoy it so much that I would not know how to do without it. MRS. G. E.

THE CHINESE NESTORIAN TABLET

By D. E. MOSLYN HOOPS

EVER since the advent of the first man, mankind has, owing to the frequent repetition of history, gradually sunk into a narrow apathetic groove, out of which it is very difficult to move him. Now and again some event takes place which arouses his curiosity and interest, and gives him food for the usual nine days' wonder-talk and conjecture, after which he relapses into the rut from which he has been dislodged. When, then, the story of the Nestorian Tablet becomes generally known, and the strenuous efforts which have been made to obtain a replica of this most valuable trophy are proclaimed to the civilized world, a feeling of admiration will be excited for the intrepid pluck and indomitable perseverance which caused Frits von Holm, M.R.A.S., a young Dane, to plunge himself deep into the heart of one of the least known countries on the earth's surface, China, in order to secure an exact reproduction of this ancient memorial, raised to the memory of the first Christian missionaries who introduced Christianity into China.

The Nestorian Tablet
Photographed from the Original

The earliest known attempt to introduce Christianity into China was made by the Nestorian Church in the seventh century, though, according to tradition, not many years elapsed from the time of the apostolic mission before the Gospel was preached there. There is reason to believe that as early as the year 505 the Nestorians penetrated into the Celestial Empire, but this point is not quite clear. The only important record which has been found in China of this church, is this tablet, which was unearthed quite accidentally by Chinese workmen in 1625. Its authenticity was not difficult to establish, owing to its being in perfect condition. There have been put forward several translations of the 2,000 characters inscribed on the stone, the inscriptions being in Chinese and Syriac. The style of writing is very terse and the exact meaning is a little difficult to determine. The text conveys an eulogy of the "Illustrious Religion" and an ode, in addition to which are inscribed the names of sixty-seven priests who introduced the new religion.

Although the stone was not discovered till 1625, it is established that its erection took place in 781. The workmen who found the tablet informed the Governor of Shensi Province, and this official caused it to be re-erected on a "fair pedestal," a stone tortoise, on which it remained until October 2, 1907, when it was moved by order of His Excellency, Governor Chao (present Governor of Shensi), to the city of Sian-fu—a most important event, as far as the preservation of the stone is concerned, and one of the most important results of Mr. von Holm's expedition. In Sian-fu the tablet was placed in the Peilin or "stone coppice," where the photograph shows it. The years 781, 1625 and 1907 are therefore the most important years in the history of the Chingchiaopei, as the natives call the Nestorian tablet.

Mr. Frits von Holm was born in 1881, and was educated as an officer in the Royal Danish Navy. After having lived several years in the East, he returned in 1904 to Denmark and England, and in 1907 went out again to the Far East as a special correspondent on this his latest mission. The quest was almost exclusively carried out with American capital, however. Leaving Tientsin with an interpreter and a "boy," or servant, he traveled in houseboat along the Grand Canal 500 miles to Taokou. From there he continued toward the west with caravan, arriving in Sian-fu, about a thousand miles from Peking, in the beginning of June. Settling himself in such a manner as was least calculated to arouse curiosity and invite observation, he engaged a draughtsman and four skilled stone-cutters, and, explaining to them the nature of the work he wished to be carried out, he bargained with them for the making of a perfect replica of the famous Nestorian stone.

The manner in which the replica was made was as follows: A suitable two-ton slab of rough limestone was procured, of such dimensions that, after allowing an adequate amount for chipping and chiseling, it would produce a copy of the tablet of the exact dimensions, viz.: nine feet high, three by four feet broad and nearly a foot thick. This being safely secured, it was transferred secretly to the temple-shed, where the stone-cutters, guided by the accurately designed drawings of the artist, proceeded to turn out a new Nestorian tablet of the same material as the original.

A vast amount of criticism was launched at the head of the young Dane, when his intention was discovered. The idea of a "foreign devil" making a copy of such a venerable object was repugnant to the conservatism of the Chinese. So fierce was the feeling against the young man that his life was actually attempted at Chengchow, when the stone was on the road to civilization. He still carries with him a good-sized scar on the top of his head, which indicates only too clearly the violence of the attack. He was unconscious for four days after the blow.

When the work on the replica in Sian-fu was nearing completion, Mr. von Holm returned thither from Hankow, where he had gone for a rest. He invited the Chinese officials in Sian-fu to inspect the replica, and after long negotiations obtained a passport for its safe transportation to the coast, 1,300 miles distant. The immense size and weight of the replica (for it weighs, like the original, two tons) made its transportation a matter of serious difficulty. With the aid of numerous coolies, however, he managed to have it lifted on to a specially built cart to take it down to Chengchow in Honan, where it might go by rail to Hankow, and thence by steamer to Shanghai. At Hankow, a treaty port, the foreign customs commissioner in Chinese employ (a man by name of Aglen) seized the trophy, impounded it and instructed the firm in whose warehouse it was temporarily stored to detain it. Aglen's superior, however, Sir Robert Hart, G.C.M.G., gave orders for its release and restoration, and Aglen got a well-deserved reprimand. The river-steamer Loongwho took the famous prize to Shanghai, whence it was shipped to New York on the oil steamer Kennebec. Mr. von Holm, who did not desire to leave the tablet, traveled by this tramp boat, and thus got a well-earned rest of three months after his perilous trip into the interior of China, which occupied a year.

DR. WOODROW WILSON INSTALLED AS GOVERNOR

AMID a scene of enthusiasm such as is rarely witnessed in the arena of politics or statecraft, Dr. Woodrow Wilson was inaugurated governor of New Jersey at the State capitol in Trenton, on January 17. The ceremony took place on the stage of Taylor's Opera House, where the legislature had assembled to welcome the new chief. The large building was crowded with a brilliant assembly of citizens prominent in all walks of life, who had come to testify by their presence the satisfaction and gratification they felt in the triumph of Dr. Wilson, a man who has endeared himself to all by his scholarship no less than by those traits of head and heart which appeal to the best instincts of humanity.

The oath of office was administered to the incoming executive by Chief Justice Gummere and the invocation pronounced by Rev. Henry Collin Minton, pastor of the First Presbyterian church, Trenton. On coming forward to deliver his inaugural address, the newly installed governor was received with a salvo of applause. In his speech, Dr. Wilson took an advanced stand on the public questions of the day and outlined reforms in legislation, the requirements of which, he maintained, were evident and emphatic. Among these he first placed the control of corporations, and dwelt upon the necessity of curbing the power of the great monopolies. He advocated a Workingman's Compensation Act and spoke of the necessity for the inspection and limitation of time as affecting foodstuffs in cold storage. He also declared himself in favor of the extension of direct primaries to all elective offices and political committees, and dwelt on the enlargement of the powers of the New Jersey Public Utilities Commission. The whole discourse showed that the speaker had a thorough grasp of the public situation and that his sympathies lay on the side of the working classes. Dr. Wilson wants the people to take charge of their own affairs by unceasing and intelligent participation in all matters relating to government; he is insistent that they look well to their representatives and see to it that they do not return time-servers, place-hunters and grafters.

The Inauguration of Governor Woodrow Wilson at Trenton, N. J.

Woodrow Wilson's advent in public life is the beginning of a new era—the entrance of the scholar into State politics. It is hoped that he will be followed by others of the same class. The era of the uneducated strong-arm grafter and professional politician, whose motto is "might is right," and who traffics in the dearest privileges of the people for his own aggrandizement, has been far too long. It would be well for the country if we had many more Woodrow Wilsons.

Cold Morality

"I THANK Thee that I am not as other men are" is part of the prayer of the Pharisee. When shall we understand that there is no more credit in being good than there is in being healthy? When a man is good he is what God meant him to be. Why should he boast of it? I find that a great deal of pride of morality is shown by people that have not the courage to sin. They would sin if they dared. They may stay at home like the elder brother, because they are afraid to venture out. Therefore they affect to despise the prodigals. Cold, fishy morality is worthless, anyway. What we want is the real human tenderness of Jesus, who never boasted of what he did or did not do, but was always ready to aid fallen men or women with his sympathy, and send them on their way with new courage to do better next time.—*Rev. The Wonderful Boys' Corn Club

Raised 55 Bushels to the Acre with a Goat as Helper

Who Raised 152 Bushels to the Acre

By ROSA PENDLETON CHILES

IT IS beyond question that the most interesting feature of the Farmers' Co-operative Demonstration Work, conducted by Dr. S. A. Knapp, under the auspices of the United States Department of Agriculture, is the Boys' Corn Club, composed of boys between ten and eighteen years of age. Its object is to stimulate interest in improved methods of farming, to educate farmers for the important task of producing enough for our vastly increasing population, to show how a larger farm yield will lessen the cost of living, and to create a love for rural life by demonstrating to the boy that farming can be robbed to a great extent of its drudgery, and made more profitable than almost any city employment to which a young man can devote himself.

Professor O. B. Martin, formerly State Superintendent of Education in South Carolina, is in charge of this branch of the demonstration work. From the first, the boys have been enthusiastic, and their success has surpassed the standards set for them. The work of organization is done by agents of the government, superintendents of education, and teachers, and the boys are started upon their career as farmers with hearty encouragement from the public. They agree each to cultivate one acre in corn under the instructions of the Bureau of Plant Industry, and to report each year to that Bureau, giving a full account of the work and itemizing their expenses.

I have before me the history of a boy's crop, written by himself, which shows clear understanding and wise management at times when only the application of a well-chosen expedient could have saved the corn from ruin. The paper would do credit to a seasoned agriculturist.

In order to insure greater interest in a work of such importance, merchants, bankers, superintendents of education, governors, and various organizations offer prizes in the township, county, and State, and sometimes a thousand people assemble to witness the presentation of these prizes. Forty thousand dollars was awarded in this way last year. In addition to the special prizes that can go to only a few boys, governors of States offered in 1910 a certificate of merit to every boy who raised seventy-five bushels of corn to the acre at a reasonable cost. None of the prizes are given upon yield alone; economy in production must be shown; the boys must learn that farming can be made a profitable industry. The grading is as follows: Highest yield, 30 per cent.; best showing of profit, 30 per cent.; best history of crop, 20 per cent.; and best ten ears of corn, 20 per cent. The boys who win State prizes are given a trip to Washington, and there receive diplomas from the Department of Agriculture, presented by Secretary Wilson himself—not mere certificates of merit, but diplomas of honor, on sheepskin that will last. Four of these came to Washington in 1909, when there were 12,000 members of the club, eleven in 1910, when the membership had increased to 46,000, covering organization in 600 counties.

The record of the boys who won State prizes last year will give an idea of what is being accomplished:

Secretary Wilson, Dr. Knapp and Some of the Prize Winners

The largest yield here given—228¾ bushels—is next to the largest ever made. The writer has the pleasure of knowing the gentleman who holds the world's record, 254 bushels. He is an experienced farmer, living on some of the richest land in the world, and he dug two wells in the field, in order to water his crop if the clouds failed to drop sufficient moisure. He also made a framework to protect the corn from damage by the wind. The boy who stands next to him is a mere child, inexperienced in farming, and he spent nothing upon artificial means of caring for his crop.

The average of production for the eleven winners of State prizes was 134 bushels to the acre, and the average cost of production about 25 cents a bushel. Most of this corn will be sold for seed at a price ranging from two to four dollars a bushel. Sold at two dollars, the gain would be $1.75 a bushel, or $235.50 for the average production of 134 bushels. Counting their cash prizes, some of these boys made $500 or $600 last year. One boy made about $1,000. The stimulating effect of this will be equaled only by the purchasing power of the money itself, which will all be spent for a good purpose. Some of the boys will buy improved farming implements and more stock; others will go to college.

In mentioning the prize-winners, the rest of the boys must not be forgotten. All of the 46,225 did well. In a county in Mississippi, 48 boys averaged 92 bushels per acre. In a county in South Carolina, 142 boys averaged 62 bushels.

The visit to Washington produces a great effect. Secretary Wilson's address to them was full of encouragement. I quote a few sentences from the Secretary that other boys who read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may catch inspiration from the value placed by the greatest men in the land upon the efforts of these boys, who, so early in life, have begun to do something worth while:

"Well, young gentlemen, you have done something that has created more interest throughout the United States than has been done in this year of grace by anybody else. Boys under sixteen years of age—think of that! Men can hold high office and come here to Washington for a term of six or ten, or so many years, and I think it would put a great many of them to their resources to show whether during all those years they have done as fine a piece of work for the people of our common country as each of you has done in his own State. To do a thing of this kind has a nation-wide effect. We are proud of you; you have done a grand thing, and I have no doubt you will go on with your studies, so as to rank up with the great men of your States. When I was in Congress I was the only farmer in it. It would not hurt Congress one particle to have two. I give you this word of advice: Go on from step to step and get some education along the lines of scientific agriculture. Rise to the foremost requirements of your people, and occupy the places in your home States that can be occupied by high intelligence, rigid economy, and undying industry. The world will want you and you will not be forgotten."

—THE PASTORS of Atlanta, Ga., have adopted resolutions that they will no longer preach "begging" sermons, but will attend to the Gospel and leave the work of raising money to the proper church authorities. They declare that this work has been a detriment to spiritual success in the pulpit.

"National Honor" as a Cause of War

IN THE French Chamber of Deputies lately, a resolution was introduced inviting the Republic to join the movement begun by the United States to make arbitration treaties with all foreign countries—in other words, that France should place itself on record in favor of universal arbitration. The Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Pichon, opposed the resolution, which found many supporters among the Deputies. He said that France, although a warm friend of peace, was not ready to arbitrate questions involving "vital interests and national dignity."

It is an old idea that, where "national honor" is involved, the only resort is that of arms. This is an outworn fallacy. There is no question that can possibly arise between two countries which is incapable of being sanely and satisfactorily adjusted through the medium of a proper legal tribunal. "National honor" is a keenly sensitive thing, and has been made the pretext for many wars, when the quarrel could have been safely trusted to the law. We believe the people of France to be as sensible, law-abiding and honorable as any nation in the world. Although they are as sensitive as others on any point of national honor and dignity, they recognize the folly of allowing every vexatious incident that may arise to become a summons to arms. France has thus far taken a very active part in the peace propaganda, and we trust to see the republic ably and successfully represented in the movement for general arbitration, which is now the leading topic in every cabinet in Europe. France must not be behind, where England, Germany, Russia, Italy, the United States and even Japan are all represented in the vanguard of the great reform which must inure to the advantage of every nation.

Significant as indicating the attitude of the British people toward the peace proposals in President Taft's recent message was the cablegram received at the White House a few days ago from leading editors in England, Scotland and Wales. Significant also was the fact that Lord Northcliffe's name did not appear on the list of peace advocates. With a greater audience than any other living journalist, he stands aloof, when his name and influence would be a tower of strength in the peace movement. Some of these days, however, the Jupiter Tonans of journalism will cease forging thunderbolts and will coo the gentlest of all the doves. The peace tide is rising and no latter-day Canute can drive it back. Northcliffe and the Times should get in out of the drift before it becomes a flood.

Should the Drinker Be Licensed?

IS THE drinker as much to blame for the iniquities of the liquor traffic as the saloonkeeper? This question is brought sharply to the front by a bill lately introduced in the Indiana legislature. It proposes that drinkers be licensed, that no unlicensed person should be able to buy liquor, that the license must set forth that he does not drink to excess, that he can afford to drink and that his indulgence does not inflict hardship upon his family or disturb his business. Of course, such a measure need hardly be expected to pass in any State legislature; yet the novel idea is not without its good points. Would a licensed drinker be proud of his distinction and wear his license publicly? Would it all too palpably mark off the goats from the sheep, in a temperance sense? Would the possession of such a certificate be a passport or a bar to decent society? The suggestion has the distinctive flavor of a liquor apologist who desires to shift the odium from the tempter to the tempted, from the rum seller to his victim. It is a unique phase of the great temperance question—nothing more.

The Drop in Food Prices

WHAT may prove to be the break-up of the iniquitous combination which is largely responsible for the high food prices of the last two years, occurred in New York a few days ago. In the board room of the Mercantile Exchange a number of wholesale dealers made the startling announcement that they were losing money on all foodstuffs now in cold storage. For nearly two years, meat, butter, eggs, milk and practically every edible that could be put in storage has been held at figures which, together with the additional charges made by the retailers, made life extremely hard for a very large proportion of the population. Now, however, the wholesalers find that they have overshot the mark and have accumulated far larger stocks in storage than can be got rid of. Much against their will, they have been compelled to make a cut in the prices of eggs and butter, averaging 25 per cent. on all grades. Necessarily, the retailers must follow, although they will doubtless hold on to the higher figures as long as possible. Meat, fowl, and other necessaries will share sympathetically in the downward trend. It is said that some of the larger wholesalers will lose heavily by the enforced reduction. Thirty-two warehouses in the West are reported to have in storage 44,000,000 pounds of butter, eggs and poultry, which they must now sell at a loss. In a good many cities, the prices of eggs, butter, pork, lard and other commodities have already been reduced by retailers. It was inevitable that prices should come down sooner or later, and the public will have little sympathy with those who are losers by the general tumble. Last year's figures were purely the result of gambling in the necessaries of life. These gamblers have been caught as in a trap of their own making. They have compelled the public to pay famine figures for food at a time when the country was prosperous and crops and livestock abundant, and now the "ultimate consumer" can look on unmoved while they pay the penalty of their own greed. An open winter, magnificent crops, and a falling market have combined to bring about better conditions. There is probably no other country in the world whose people will stand so much squeezing as our own; but if we have learned a lesson from the conditions created by the food combinations, we ought to apply our experience by making such combinations legally impossible hereafter.

The Memorial Movement

THE popular movement to endow Mont-Lawn as an enduring memorial to Dr. Klopsch's memory is steadily growing. Originating in a suggestion in Mr. Pepper's biographical book, The Life-Work of Louis Klopsch, it has been taken up by good people all over the country, who now unite in the demand: "Let Mont-Lawn be his monument!" We have outlined on another page a plan by which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers may co-operate effectively in this movement. It would seem as if the hand of Providence were leading in the whole matter. We feel assured that Dr. Klopsch, if his silent lips could speak, would choose no other memorial than this. Next to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Mont-Lawn lay closest to his heart; and it is fitting that the two should be permanently associated with his memory. For his journal, he had a vision of world-wide Christian service. He planned to make it a great power for righteousness, national, State, civic and individual; a far-reaching influence for Gospel dissemination; a bond to knit together the great company of God's people in America for Christian service. Such was his vision, and his paper was the agency through which he hoped to make it come to pass. And all who aid the Mont-Lawn Memorial Movement are helping to extend the influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and to translate Dr. Klopsch's vision into a reality.

China's Hard Struggle

AS THE Chinese imperial budget for the next fiscal year discloses the fact that the government has to face a deficit of 78,000,000 taels—approximately $46,800,000—it can be readily understood that the Chinese authorities are ill prepared to deal with the conditions that prevail in several of the most populous provinces at the present time. It is proposed to resort to a foreign loan to make up the deficit. Notwithstanding the depressed condition of its finances, the government has made an appropriation for the famine-stricken provinces of Anhui and Kiang-su. Each governor has to look after the finances of his own province. This year, on account of the total crop failures in the two provinces named and the partial failure in others adjoining them, the provincial revenues are reduced to a minimum. With these unfortunate local conditions confronting them and being unable to secure assistance from neighboring provinces, as would be the case in more prosperous years, the governors of Anhui and Kiang-su have naturally turned for assistance to those foreign countries that aided them in the past. Our own land, by its noble generosity toward the Chinese in the famines of 1901 and 1907, has won a high place in the estimation of the people of that country. Our benevolences have been the means of saving countless lives, but they have done more; they have opened doors to the Gospel that had long been shut; they have won the confidence and esteem of the authorities and people and have made the name of America a synonym for genuine friendship and practical Christianity. Every gift to China in the present severe crisis means not only the saving of lives and the healing of the body, but the founding of an enduring sentiment of Christian brotherhood. By helping China now, you are rendering the very best service possible to the cause of the Gospel and humanity. They have turned to us for aid and, God helping us, we shall not leave them to perish.

General Notes

—THE GERMAN submarine, U 3, sank in Kiel harbor, January 17, and was partially raised after three hours' work. The commander and two of the crew, who were in the conning tower, were drowned.

—A MANIAC, named Gisolme, in the public gallery of the French Chamber of Deputies, twice attempted to shoot Premier Briand, on January 17, but missed him, and a bullet slightly wounded a deputy, M. Mirman. The assailant was arrested.

—TWENTY-FIVE MEN and one woman, charged with conspiracy to assassinate the Emperor of Japan, the Crown Prince, and other high officials, have been condemned to death by the Supreme Court at Tokyo. All were avowed anarchists. Their sentences may be commuted to life imprisonment.

—"CAESAR," the pet terrier of the late King Edward, has taken his place in history ahead of the famous canines of Scott and Burns, which Landseer loved to paint. The London tradespeople have reaped a rich harvest through his popularity. Hundreds of thousands of models of him have been sold in the toy shops. "Cæsar" accompanies Dowager Queen Alexandra on her travels and gets a cot in the royal sleeping room.

—THE RESIGNATION of Dr. Henry Van Dyke, professor of English literature in Princeton University, is a distinct event in literary and religious circles. It has been impendng several months. While the university will be the loser, the reading world, which greatly loves Dr. Van Dyke and admires his work, will be the gainer by his increased leisure, which will mean a larger and more frequent output of his fertile pen, which has given so much pleasure and edification in the past. He proposes to go on preaching and writing, unfettered by definite engagement.

Cut Rembrandt's Masterpiece

LOVERS of art throughout the world were shocked by a telegram from Amsterdam indicating that Rembrandt's most famous picture, "The Night Watch," was badly damaged by a discharged naval cook, named Sigrist, who entered the Rijks-Museum and with a knife cut the picture. "The Night Watch" is a canvas 11 x 14 feet, and is Rembrandt's largest and most celebrated work, which he painted in 1642. It represents Captain Cocq's company of the civic guard emerging from their guild house on the Singel. In the middle in front marches the captain in a dark brown costume; at his side Lieutenant Wilhem Van Ruitenberg in a yellow buffalo jerkin. On the right hand of the captain is an arquebusier loading his weapon, and two children. A step behind them is the flag-bearer, Jan Visser Cornelissen. The other side of the picture breathes a similar life and spirit, from the lieutenant to the drummer, Jan van Kamboort. The knife cut through the principal figures of Captain Frans Banning Cocq's company of arquebusiers. On his arrest Sigrist declared that his act was one of vengeance against the government for his discharge from the naval service. The vandal might have wreaked his vengeance in undertaking to sink a government ship, or by blowing up one of the public buildings, or by firing the royal palace; but he sought a deeper injury and one that would cause more widespread regret, in a damage to the greatest treasure in Amsterdam, the noblest work in the Rijks-Museum. In composition, color, light and spirit, the picture exhibited Rembrandt's genius at the best. It is in a class with Raphael's Sistine Madonna and the "Mona Lisa" of Da Vinci. Its money value is beyond estimate. Some art experts express the opinion that the damage is not beyond repair, but if the picture must be scarred or partly repainted by a modern brush, however skilful, the damage of Sigrist will be incalculable. It would be thought that a man in trouble would want friends, but revenge in this instance made a nation of enemies. The unspeakable meanness of the act justified the wisdom of his discharge. Imprisonment for life would be a just punishment for this wretch. Revenge has always been a hellish thing, inflicting fatal wounds and infinite damage. It murdered Garfield and shot Gaynor. It is ugly, it is diabolical, even in little hearts and little acts. It is cherished by many otherwise good, who mistake it for a righteous indignation. It is thus condemned by the apostle:

Avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath; for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. (Rom. 12:19.)

Rembrandt's "Night Watch," the Famous Painting Damaged by a Vandal

Rembrandt (1607-1669) was chief of the Dutch School, and famed for his "lights and shades" and subtle coloring

Asked Water; Got Poison

George Melber, the little five-year-old son of a widow, Mrs. Edith Melber, was thirsty and asked his mother for a drink of water. In place of it she gave him carbolic acid, perpetrating one of the foulest murders in the history of crime. The scene of the tragedy was near Albany, N. Y. Upon being arrested the mother told this story:

"I was almost exhausted and worn out with worrying. There seemed to be no place in the world for my boy. We walked down the street and I stopped at a drug store and bought some chocolates for George. I also bought a bottle of carbolic acid. We had nowhere to go and we walked the streets until I could hardly stand. At last we got on a car and rode for a while on the road to Schenectady. There were very few houses, and it was cold and dark and lonely. I took George's hand and we started to walk along the road. He was so tired, poor little son, that he could hardly drag one foot after the other. He was crying softly, so as not to worry me, and finally he stopped. 'Mamma,' he sobbed, 'I'm awfully tired and awfully thirsty, too.' There was no place near by where I could get a drink of water for him. Then I remembered that I had the bottle of poison in my hand. I had been carrying it all the time, but had forgotten it. We left the road and went into a field. 'Mamma,' Georgie said, 'can't you get me a drink of water?' I uncorked the bottle and held it to his little mouth. 'Here's some water, Georgie,' I said. 'Drink this.' He believed me—he always believed what I told him—and drunk it. He just gave one little sound, like a sort of choking sob—that was all. He struggled for a minute, but I held him. Then he slipped from my arms and fell on the ground. It didn't last long and I stayed with him until he was quiet. Then I kissed him, smoothed his curls back, straightened his poor little limbs and went away."

The little dead boy was found the next morning frozen to the ground. Since her husband's death four years ago, Mrs. Melber has worked hard doing servant work in homes, and says that, falling ill and being unable to pay board in a children's home for her son, she was compelled to take him away. She says that her husband's relatives would not take the child. A children's institution in another city refused her, and worried to death she killed him. The husband's relatives say they were willing to take the child, but that the mother wanted to marry again and killed her child to get him out of the way. She has been indicted on a charge of murder in the first degree, and the trial will reveal the facts, but they can in no way justify the shocking act of the mother. When a son has done his worst to ruin self and disgrace his family; when the father has cut the son's name out of the family Bible and left it out of the will, the mother will send money to her wayward boy and cry for him to come home that she may love and nurse him. No prison walls are thick enough to shut out a mother's love, and the death-chair cannot kill the devotion of a mother for her ruined boy; and yet here is a sweet, innocent, beautiful little son, crying in weariness and thirst for a drink and a place to rest in his mother's bosom; and like a demon she murders him. Even after the fountains of parental love are dried, then the streams of divine affection flow. Through so awful a gateway as this murder the sweet little boy was carried by the angels to the Saviour's bosom.

When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up. (Ps. 27:10.)

A Thrifty Bootblack

Among the prominent men who have risen to eminence we find many that began life as newsboys, messenger boys, bootblacks, etc. They usually got a long way from their simple beginnings before they had what the world calls success; but Nicholas Lalli, of Paterson, N. J., has just cleaned up $10,000 in cold cash blacking boots, and the other day he set sail for Rome, Italy, to enjoy the fruit of his labors. Thirteen years ago the little Italian immigrant came to this country with $10 in his pocket. He blacked the shoes of the judges, sheriffs, officials and patrons of the county court house at Paterson, and then after office hours he plied his calling on Main Street near the county jail. For the first time in ten years he put on a starched collar, a necktie of brilliant red, and a suit of Sunday clothes. He did the work next at hand and did it well, and was a success in life. He dignified his calling by his industry and the uprightness of his conduct, and commanded the respect of his fellow-men. The young man did the work he undertook singularly well and was the very symbol of energy. He indicated in his simple humble way some of the elements of success in business life.

He becometh poor that dealeth with a slack hand; but the hand of the diligent maketh rich. (Prov. 10:4.)

New Agricultural Products

From the report of the Department of Agriculture we learn that an explorer who was sent by that department to Southwestern Asia has discovered many seeds and plants with which to enrich our fields. He secured a variety of alfalfa from Erivan; a species of medicago from a mountain; a wild almond from Zarafshan Valley; a drought-resisting cherry for gardens in the northwest; apricots with sweet kernels from Samarkand; Afghanistan apples and pears for trial in the Gulf States; hardy olives that can stand a zero temperature; Caucasion peaches and a wild strawberry bearing fruit in February. The department deserves the thanks of the farmers and people of the country. The farmer's work is described by the prophet:

Doth the plowman plow all day to sow? Doth he open and break the clods of his ground? When he hath made plain the face thereof, doth he not cast abroad the fitches, and scatter the cummin, and cast in the principal wheat and the appointed barley and rye in their place? For his God doth instruct him to discretion and doth teach him. (Isa. 28:24-26.)

One Cent Brought Millions

Mr. William A. Campbell, of the Omaha Commercial Club, paid a penny for a newspaper, out of which he got an item which saved the farmers of Nebraska this year between four and five million dollars. The item he read was a short article mentioning the test of seed corn in Iowa. He thought it might be a good idea to test the seed corn in Nebraska. The Commercial Club of Omaha appropriated a thousand dollars and most careful tests were made. It was discovered that only 57 ears out of each hundred offered for examination were good and that had the farmers planted the corn they had laid out for the purpose there would only have been a little more than half a crop. To avert the danger Campbell printed a leaflet, which was sent throughout the State and all the newspapers printed the facts, the danger, and the proposed remedy, until the salutation of the State got to be "Good morning; have you tested your seed corn?" According to the direction, no grain was allowed to go into the ground until each ear on which it grew was carefully inspected. The result is that the corn harvest in Nebraska, instead of having a shortage of 25,000,000 bushels, has 10,000,000 bushels more than in the previous year. The same seed falling in the good ground made the harvest.

But other fell into good ground, and brought forth fruit. (Matt. 13:8.)

Earliest Pure Food Labels

The Harvard Palestine Expedition in its excavations at the city of Samaria has made some very important discoveries. Among them are the first pure food labels in history and the first record of keeping wines in a government warehouse under seal. These discoveries date back to the time of King Ahab, 900 years before Christ. These inscriptions are labels employed as seals on wine and oil jars. They mention the year in which the wine was laid down in the cellars of the government storehouse and state the vineyard from which they came. On the oil jars the labels read: "A jar of pure oil," with a mention of the district from which the oil came. About seventy-five of these labels have already been discovered in the ruins of the storehouse connected with the palace of King Ahab some 3,000 years ago, and the names of the owners indicate that other people beside the royal household made use of this storehouse. The inscriptions are written in ink with a reed pen in a plain hand, making quite a contrast to the inscriptions which the Phœnicians were accustomed to cut in stone. These excavations reveal the productions of the soil which the prophet promised.

And the floor shall be full of wheat, and the fats shall overflow with wine and oil. (Joel 2:24.)

Famine's Death-Roll in China

Missionaries Plead for Help--A Second Remittance is Cabled by the Christian Herald

THE APPEAL	THE ANSWER
CHINKIANG, 18 Jan. CHRISTIAN HERALD, N. Y. Destitution similar to 1907. Government relief inadequate. Make urgent appeal. LONGDEN.	LONGDEN, CHINKIANG. Cabling FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS additional for urgent cases. Have appealed; confident generous response. CHRISTIAN HERALD.

THIS is the latest word by cable from the heart of the Chinese famine. It is a message of appeal from Rev. W. C. Longden, chairman of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Interdenominational Committee of Missionaries at Chinkiang, and unfortunately it confirms the apprehension felt here that the famine was far more serious than first reports indicated. Immediately on receiving this message THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent Chairman Longden the cablegram which is printed side by side with the message of appeal and which conveys the news that $5,000 more has been cabled to be used by the committee for urgent cases of suffering.

This is the second remittance we have forwarded for famine relief, the first, of $1,000, having been sent on December 31. Both sums were advanced by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in anticipation of contributions, which are now being received in response to the appeal through these columns.

A Food Distribution in a Chinese Village in Famine Time

Associated with Chairman Longden on the committee at Chinkiang are the following missionaries: Rev. G. A. Cox, Rev. Frank Garrett, Rev. J. C. Garrett, D.D., Lilburn Merrill, M.D., Rev. J. W. Paxton, Rev. L. W. Pierce, Rev. A. Sydenstricker, D.D., M. J. Walker, Esq., Rev. James B. Webster. The last named is treasurer of the committee, which represents six different Protestant Missionary Boards, each with large spiritual interests and a corps of workers in the Chinese field. Under the board and distributed throughout the two famine-stricken provinces of Anhui and Kiangsu are many other missionary workers, who co-operate with the Chinkiang committee.

On January 14, Chairman Longden had already cabled to this journal that a condition of great distress prevailed in Anhui province. His latest message shows the progress of the famine, which is doubtless approaching its maximum when the suffering and mortality will be appalling. Over a thousand are perishing of starvation and famine fever, notwithstanding that every effort is being made to arrest the famine and alleviate suffering.

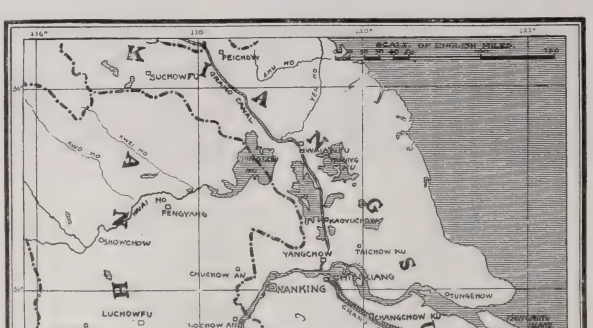
Our State Department in Washington has cable advices from the two provinces which give this gloomy picture of the situation:

"Men, women and children are dying of cold and hunger and the measures of relief seem entirely inadequate. To make matters worse, biting cold weather now prevails among the destitute. The Chinese authorities have appointed committees to investigate and enroll the names of those in need of most urgent help. The Throne has contributed a considerable sum of money, but it was regarded as insufficient. A general international relief committee has been formed at Shanghai. It is estimated that not less than $4,000,000, Mexican, will be needed to carry the people through the winter and spring. No fresh harvest can be expected until May. The American Red Cross has given some assistance, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of New York, is seeking subscriptions for the same purpose. The Seattle Chamber of Commerce has requested information as to the extent of the need and is preparing to send a contribution."

The Chinese consul in New York, on January 17, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD stating that places in Hwai-au-fu, Hsu-chow, and Hai-chow, in the northern part of the province of Kiang-su; and Feng-yang-fu and Ying-chow in the northern part of the province of Anhui have been flooded, and are suffering greatly from famine. Telegrams were also received from the Viceroy of Liang-Kiang, and the Governor of Anhui, stating that the famine in the northern part of Anhui is much more serious than that in Kiang-su. The government relief work is in charge of Taotai Shen-Tun Ho and Dr. Ferguson. Both the governor and the viceroy add that foreign help is greatly needed and will be more than welcome.

As already explained, the famine is the result of several months of torrential rains, which have swept away hundreds of villages, bringing death and desolation to thousands of inhabitants. Several million persons are in desperate need of relief.

His Excellency, Chang Yin Tang, the Chinese Minister at the Capital, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, under date January 14:



"The latest news I have is contained in a cablegram just received at this legation from the Viceroy at Nanking, in which he refers to the situation as being most grave, and without any prospect of immediate improvement, especially in the province of Anhui, adding that, in spite of the fact that the relief work was being vigorously prosecuted, conditions had not improved to any appreciable extent, as the fund at his disposal for the purpose was far from being adequate. I sincerely trust that your relief movement will be successful, and that it will result in untold benefit to the famine-stricken population of these provinces."

From the number of letters we are receiving daily it is evident that the great sympathetic heart of the American people has been deeply moved by the suffering in China. Many of the letters are extremely touching. "I am glad that it is my privilege to contribute to the relief fund," writes Mrs. M. B., Tama, Ia. ($1). "I want to answer the cry for help of the distressed, so I send on a little." "God bless you in your work," writes M. E. T., Wayne, O. ($2). "I send this to apply to the China Famine Fund; it seems so little to give, but may God add his blessing," writes T. J. A., Bement, Ill. ($2). Many of the contributors desire that their names should not be published. Miss A. C., Cass Lake, Minn., who sends a gift of $5 to the fund, accompanies it with some sympathetic verses, one stanza being the following:

> There's a cry from the children
> To each passerby,
> "Give us bread or we perish"—
> A pitiful cry.

"I wish my gift might be more," writes Mrs. J. A. T., Ausable Forks, N. Y. ($1), "but it is all I have. I trust that those who have money may realize the great need. Though I can give but little yet I add my prayers." "You are certainly to be commended for your assistance in this great work," writes W. B. G., Somerset, Ky., who sends $3 to the relief fund. "I will send my mite, as I am an old woman and what I do I must do quickly," writes Mrs. A. D., Macon, Mo. ($1), and adds: "It is only a little, but it is cheerfully given, with the prayer that God may bless it for the relief of some suffering one." "I want to help a little," writes M. J. D., Mooreshill, Ind. ($1). "When I became a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family, it made me happy, for I knew that I would be in company with God's people. Dr. Klopsch's last greeting is among my treasures." "My precious daughter has passed to the beyond," writes Mrs. S. M. W. Landes, Wyo. ($10), "and this is as a memorial to her." "Mine is only a widow's mite," writes Mrs. A. B., Knoxville, Tenn. ($2), "but with God's blessing it may save a soul from death."

St. Moritz, the Skater's Paradise

The Great Open-Air Rink at St. Moritz, said to be the Finest Skating Area to be Found Anywhere

FOR the votaries of outdoor recreation, old King Winter, wherever he reigns, holds out as many inducements as fair-haired Summer, goddess of bright skies and smiling landscapes. Indeed, in many places, the pastimes of winter are more diversified and more interesting than those of summer. Whatever form the winter enjoyment takes, whether it is skating in the United States, tobogganing on the hills of Canada, skiing over the snow fields of Norway, curling in old England, ice hockey in bonnie Scotland, or climbing up the Alps in Switzerland, it appeals to the true instinct for wholesome pastime and healthy exercise.

Almost every country has some spot set apart to its seasonal amusements, but there is always a particular place which, like a magnet, draws the crowds from all lands by the inducements it has to offer. Such is Switzerland. To this land of lakes and mountains, waterfalls and cascades, waving woods and forests, they come from many quarters of the globe. Of course the Alps, the eternal Alps, with their snow-clad peaks, are the great attraction which draws to this land the tourist and the traveler. Switzerland may be called the winter garden of Europe. At this time of year, Britons and Americans flock there, like crows to a cornfield, or bees to the honeysuckle. Crowds swoop down on the Bernese Oberland, they take possession of Grindelwald, Adelboden, Kandersteg, Gstaad, Beatenberg and Wengen. They convert all Helvetia into a huge winter playground. But of all the places dear to winter amusement and to lovers of genuine winter sport, St. Moritz is easily the premier. This is a little village, with a native population of some 1,600, in that part of the Canton of Grisons called the upper Engadine, in the southeast corner of Switzerland, towards the Italian border. It is pleasantly situated with a southern aspect on a slope of the Rhaetian Alps, about 6,000 feet above sea-level. It is picturesquely surrounded by woods of larch and cembra, stretching up the mountain face. Some 300 feet below is the little lake of the same name on which there is much pleasure-boating and fishing parties. Looking from St. Moritz eastward, the eye ranges down the Engadine as far as Zernetz; to the westward the peaks of the Alps can be seen extending beyond the pass of Maloggia. There is a subdued, chaste beauty in the landscape. It has not the striking grandeur of Central Switzerland or the towering impressiveness of the Italian Alps, but the general aspect is bright and pleasing. Though the village at times is exposed to the bitter winds that sweep through the trough of the Engadine, the place is dry and the atmosphere healthy. The winter is severe but sunny. At night, the temperature drops to as low as fifteen degrees, but during the sunshine of the day it sometimes rises to one hundred, and invalids can sit out in chairs on the street. There is always a crowded winter colony of foreigners, notably English and Americans. The place is well supplied with good shops and hotel accommodation is excellent.

There are ice carnivals at St. Moritz during the winter. There are several skating-rinks and these are always crowded with care-free, jolly crowds, whizzing over the glittering surface. White curling is a favorite amusement also, and is a game which requires much experience and dexterity. During the season there is great fun in competitive toboggan races down the steep slopes of the mountain. Sometimes the toboggans acquire a velocity equal to an express train and unless the sleighs are carefully manipulated and steered by competent hands on such occasions there is a great element of danger in the sport.

On the whole, St. Moritz well repays a visit in the winter and instils memories which are never afterwards forgotten.

Mrs. William Sincock, treasurer of the Woman's Missionary Society of Red Jacket Congregational Church, Calumet, Mich., forwards $25 for the famine sufferers, being the contribution of the society—a timely and generous offering. A. H., Denver, Colo., who sends $10, adds: "I do hope that you will continue the good work that Dr. Klopsch was doing. Many, many Christians are willing to help." "A sympathizer in all good works," C. E. B., Jones, Mich., encloses $2. The Missionary Society of Church Hollow, Harpersville, N. Y., sends through its treasurer, Mrs. H. S. Mayhew, $5 to the famine fund. "This is the 'Lord's tenth'," writes F. M., Delton, Mich., in forwarding $25 to the fund. Mrs. C. B., Afton, Ia., sends a similar liberal offering. "My sympathy has been touched and I enclose a draft for $5 towards the famine fund," writes H. M., Clarence, Ia. "I hope that the hearts of people will be open to give for the relief of these suffering ones," is the prayer of S. J. R., Claremont, N. H., who sends $5. "I respond to your earnest appeal for the starving ones in China. It is heart-rending to think of such conditions," writes Mrs. J. V. N., Shuqualak, Miss. ($1). These are examples of hundreds of others that are now being received by every mail.

BY THE GLOW OF THE FIRELIGHT

The Holiday Season and After

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

NOTWITHSTANDING a general impression to the contrary, the close of the holidays does not betoken the immediate coming of spring. Far from it. In the cold February days we women may as well settle down to indoor occupations on which we may concentrate attention. We ought to do something in the line of serious reading. A group of neighbors or a circle of acquaintances may profitably meet each week or fortnight and, having selected a book of essays, a good biography or perhaps one of the most important issues of current fiction, may read and discuss their author and his work beside the winter fire. If this meeting take place in the afternoon, a cup of tea will be in order before the friends separate. Home evenings where married people come together socially once a week or once a month as may suit their convenience will do much to draw a community into close and agreeable relationship. The ideal way to have good times is to have social meetings in which both sexes mingle, husbands and wives, young men and maidens and the growing boys and girls uniting in diversions or seeking instruction by means of popular lectures. It would be well for us all if the good old custom of listening to lectures from able and eloquent speakers might be generally restored. Women can do much to bring this about. The men are otherwise employed, and the social engineering of township or countryside is naturally left to the responsible guidance of the women. They are fully equal to every demand.

Church work takes a new start after the holidays. The midweek meeting is better attended in winter than in summer. The ladies have their own plans for raising funds. Suppers, concerts, charades or fairs enlist young and old, and from the grandmother to the girl in her teens every one finds something to do when the roof of the sanctuary leaks and must be repaired, when the old carpet must be succeeded by a new one, when the Sunday School library is to be replenished, or it is desirable to reduce a mortgage. There are those who criticise feminine methods of increasing church funds. They quite overlook the fact that people learn to know one another and love one another more fully and more certainly when they are giving time, thought and toil in a social way for a purpose of general interest than when they simply give money from their individual store. Both ways are good, but do not censure the way of the women. May we all have a happy year in useful and self-denying work.

In winter the home larder may be well stocked with good things to eat. The country housewife has her hams, sausages and poultry ready at hand, her supplies are not renewed from day to day by an order given to a tradesman, and her fruit-cake, doughnuts and mince pies furnish her with variety, toothsome and spicy, with which she may entertain her friends and cheer her family in the holiday week.

The country cousins are to be congratulated in these winter days. With the rural telephone, the furnace in the cellar, the electric plant that makes the whole house blossom into fairy-like beauty, the farmhouse of to-day may safely bear comparison with the most comfortably equipped city mansion in the land. Not every farmhouse cares for these modern conveniences and not every farmer's wife desires anything better than the old-fashioned luxury of a base burner, a log fire on a wide hearth and lamps to shed their radiance over the household group. In city and country alike the essentials of good housekeeping are precisely the same. We require immaculate cleanliness, pleasant warmth, safe shelter from the elements, enough to eat and enough to wear. If we have these we need not fear the utmost stress of wintry cold.

Women in Council Several subjects of interest to every one appeal to us this week. Our first topic is of great importance, and I shall be glad to hear from both teachers and parents who may kindly give their views and relate their experiences.

Winter Scenes in Holland

AMONG winter sports skating takes high rank. Our artist shows a scene in Holland where boys and girls fearlessly skim over the glassy surface of a frozen canal, secure in their mastery of the skates with which they are shod. Here in America there are many expert skaters, and nothing is prettier than to watch the evolutions of graceful young men and women as they glide or circle over a frozen pond. The art once acquired is seldom lost, and the rosy-cheeked girls and eager boys may, if they choose, keep on skating in days when they are staid and sober men and matrons.

Definite Christian Teaching "I am very anxious to promote and encourage Christian teaching in our schools and colleges. I know this will not meet the approval of all. I hope, however, that there are some among CHRISTIAN HERALD readers who agree with me and will do what they can to bring our young people directly under Christian influences while they are in training for life. In my own field, I have always taken the opportunity to speak to my pupils on the subject of personal religion, have read the Bible in their hearing, prayed with them, and have had the joy of seeing many of them coming out on the side of Christ in their childhood. A TEACHER."

Jesus said: "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." No one comes more directly into contact with children than the teacher with whom they spend hours every day. Between the ages of seven and fourteen, boys and girls spend more daylight time in school than at home. The teacher may reflect that he or she may always be a living epistle, so that in schools where there is comparatively little time given to reading the Scriptures, the example and character of the teacher cannot fail to have its moulding effect. In almost all our higher preparatory schools, a great deal of attention is given to Bible study in these days. Able instructors are engaged in this department. In many of our best colleges for men and women a pervading influence comes for good from the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations. This subject is open for discussion. Write freely.

Homely Virtues "Will Mrs. Sangster be good enough to enumerate the 'homely virtues' that occur to her mind? What are they?
"MRS. O. P. S."

Read Galatians, fifth chapter, twenty-second and twenty-third verses. "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance."

The Money Question in the Home "Many wives and mothers are home-makers with no reliable income behind them. Farmers' wives often pursue some line of effort aside from housekeeping by which they raise pin money. They may raise poultry and sell eggs and chickens or do something with a garden, or keep bees, or have a small dairy, and thus they may make a little money on their own account. The wives of mechanics and professional men often have a housekeeping allowance, or possibly a personal allowance, not always in a just proportion to the husband's income. It is the wives who have no allowance who move my sympathy. There are stingy men, lazy men and selfish men who never seem to know that an empty pocketbook is a stumbling block to happiness, if it be the only thing a wife ever has after her wedding day. I wish women would speak out on this subject. J. H."

More acute misery in home life is due to stupidity and mismanagement in the realm of domestic finance than to any other single cause. I am far from believing that husbands are the only ones to blame here. The American husband has not his equal in the world for chivalry, justice and confidence in his treatment of his wife and home. Mistakes are made at the outset. People do not live within their means. Perhaps young men and women set out on a false basis without anything saved and with no margin for future expenses. No topic can be thrown into the arena with a greater certainty of eliciting good advice than this. I leave it in your hands.

Another Open Door for Women The first woman to become a wireless operator has taken her position on a coasting steamship. If she proves equal to the demands of wireless telegraphy on our storm-tossed Atlantic coast in the winter season, she will score another triumph for women. All doors fly open to the light touch of woman's skilled hand in this century of ours. There seems little which she does not attempt, and there are few occupations in which she does not succeed when she brings her mind to bear upon them.

C. H., Paducah, Ky. How many Bibles are in the world, and what are the religions they teach?

The world has seven Bibles—the Koran of the Mohammedans, the Eddas of the Scandinavians, the Tripitaka of the Buddhists, the Five Kings of the Chinese, the Three Vedas of the Hindus, the Zendavesta of the Persians and the Scriptures of the Christians. The Koran dates from the seventh century A.D.; the Eddas from the eleventh century; the Tripitaka from the seventh century B.C.; the Five Kings of the Chinese from 1100 B.C.; the Vedas are supposed by the best scholars to antedate 1100 B.C., and the Zendavesta about 1200 B.C.

Mrs. M. S., Englewood, Ill. God uses many kinds of instruments to accomplish his purposes. Those who criticise evangelists in the way referred to in your letter, do so in ignorance. Some of the greatest evangelists of modern times were men of very little worldly learning—Moody, Richard Weaver, Gipsy Smith and others are examples—yet God owned their work and made it the means of converting multitudes. They are the instruments of the Holy Spirit, but those who are spiritually blind may not understand this. Your letter has the right idea of the matter. A pastor who denounces revivals should be asked to inform himself by personal experience, and he would soon take a different view. Revivals frequently accomplish more in a single season toward awakening a church to spiritual life than a pastor can do in years.

I. R., Leland, Ill. From what source is radium obtained? What makes it so expensive, and for what is it used?

Radium is an extract of the ore of pitchblende, a black mineral of a specific gravity of 9.5, mined in Bohemia. Its scarcity makes it expensive, 1,200 pounds of pitchblende being required to produce a single grain. It is much used in surgery after the manner of X-rays, to make physical examinations of the body. It also gives excellent results in the treatment of many skin diseases, notably cancer. (You will find an exhaustive article on Radium in a book called Marvels of Modern Science, one of the Home Library set recently published by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.)

W. H. W., Bryant, Ind. 1. Shall we know each other in heaven? 2. Please explain I. Cor. 13: 12.

1. We find the assurance of heavenly recognition in a number of passages both in the Old Testament and New Testament. David said of his dead son: "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me" (II. Sam. 12: 23). See also the parable of Dives and Lazarus, which teaches recognition. See Phil. 3: 20; Heb. 12: 1; Matt. 17: 3; Rev. 6: 9, 10; Rom. 14: 12, and other passages.

J. C. G., Westgrove, Pa. 1. Explain Heb. 6: 4. 2. Where in the Bible is found a passage which says that the "saw shall not dictate to him who useth or shaketh it"?

1. Paul here refers to those who, once having been brought into the Gospel light, have fallen away or backslidden. "Enlightened" means knowledge of the truth, and "tasted" means having experience in the blessings that follow such knowledge, and especially the remission of sins and the gift of the promises. When such persons, knowing these things, had fallen back into sin, instead of struggling onward in the Christian life, they were crucifying to themselves Christ anew, instead of crucifying the world; they would need to learn again the first principles of the spiritual life. Backsliders and apostates may be in some sense renewed, yet fall away finally; but it is not implied that the elect can fall away (see John 10: 28). The whole passage refers to those of temporary faith, who have not become well-grounded or who have never really been spirit-led disciples of Christ. 2. The passage will be found in Isa. 10: 15.

C. M. H., Kipton, O. According to the old philosophers, the soul of man is the element or principle of rational and spiritual cognition. Modern philosophers have made many attempts to define the soul, with little success, however. They unite in holding that soul and mind are diverse and that spirit is a still higher potency, the spiritual aspirations of the soul (as distinguished from the rational) being infused and kindled into life and activity by divine inspiration; that the natural (i. e., unenlightened) soul is to be distinguished from the spiritual (or enlightened) soul. Others make the still subtler distinction of mind, soul and spirit, the first denoting the intelligence and the will, the second the recording power, the parent of thought and the source of moral and intellectual impulse, and the third the disembodied, ethereal, self-conscious being, concentrating in itself all the purest and noblest impulses, the highest reverence and love of God and the most exalted aspirations. It is the divine element imparted to man. You might read a dozen volumes on the subject without coming to any absolute conclusion, beyond that outlined above.

Lord Roberts Unveiling the Wolfe Monument in Kent, England

ON January 2, the above statue to General Wolfe was unveiled by Lord Roberts, before a distinguished gathering in the little village of Westerham, in Kent, England, where the "Hero of Quebec" was born on the same date 1727. It is a tardy recognition to a man who was the greatest soldier and strategist of his day, one whose deeds of daring have reflected unfading glory on the martial history of his country. Though he had a distinguished career on many fields, his name is inseparably linked with the siege of Quebec. There he had to face Montcalm, the pride and boast of the French army, whose forces greatly outnumbered the English, and who had the most favorable position both for engagement and obtaining supplies. In the final attack (1759), Wolfe scaled the Heights of Abraham in the night, and next morning with five thousand men made an impetuous rush on Montcalm's army, which was decisive of the action. Wolfe himself was fatally shot while leading a charge at the head of a company of grenadiers. His last words were: "Now God be praised, I die in peace!"

Jennie D., Rahway, N. J. Where can I find the poem entitled, "The Bogland," and who is the author?

It is in a collection of poems by Elizabeth Twigg, which you can probably procure through any good bookseller.

L. A. M., Tidioute, Pa. 1. Was polygamy, as a doctrine, introduced in the Mormon Church when it was organized in 1830? If not, when? 2. Give names of presidents of Mormon Church.

1. It is maintained that a revelation sanctioning polygamy was received by Joseph Smith, as early as 1831, but was withheld from the church in general until it had been settled in Utah (1847). After 1852, polygamy was preached and practised openly and the leaders who were converted and became splendid Christians. 2. Joseph Smith, Brigham Young, John Taylor, Wilford Woodrow (who issued a manifesto against polygamy), Lorenzo Snow and Joseph Fielding Smith, the present incumbent.

Reader, Millersville, Pa. 1. A church is the most competent judge of its own membership. Generally speaking, a church will admit a person on the regular examination and profession of faith, according to the rules and discipline; but there may be peculiar circumstances in a case which prevent this. 2. The passage is clear and not to be misunderstood. A drunkard—that is, an unrepentant, besotted person, who cannot be persuaded to give up his besetting sin, nor even to make an effort—is in a hopeless condition. Yet we have known drunkards who were converted and became splendid Christians.

H. L., Nashville, Mich. On what day, month and year was Charley Ross kidnapped?

Charles Brewster Ross, aged four, was kidnapped from his home in Washington Lane, Germantown, Philadelphia, on July 1, 1874.

C. F. K., Clinton, Ill. In what books can I get the best information concerning the Louisiana Purchase?

One of the best accounts is given in the History of the United States, 1801-1817, by Henry Adams. Other good books that treat of it are United States of Yesterday by William Barrows, and History of the Louisiana Purchase by James Q. Howard. Separate pamphlets are published by the Indiana and Missouri Historical Societies. Order through any bookseller.

H., South Dakota. Is it right for a minister, at the close of a revival, to start up a club and have in it all sorts of games, among them boxing, of which he himself is an exponent?

We have heard of a worthy missionary, strong both in grace and in physique, who wrestled his way into the good graces of the native heathen on the Congo. Jacob wrestled with an angel. With these two notable exceptions, we have never heard of God's work being advantaged by such means. Richard Weaver, the fighting collier, was a boxer before he became converted, but he never boxed afterward. The introduction of boxing beneath the roof of God's house seems to us to be profanation. Perhaps we take the old-fashioned view; at all events, we can't find even the slightest Scripture warrant for it. If there had been a boxing club in the Courts of the Temple when Jesus drove out the money-changers, we think he would have scourged the boxers just as hard as the rest.

Mrs. R. B. D., West Brookfield, Mass. The Lord gave Jeroboam ten tribes for his kingdom, and that would leave Judah and Benjamin; but in I. Kings 11: 13, 31, 32, and 12: 20, 21, it says that Judah only was left to Rehoboam. Can you explain this?

There was left to Rehoboam the large and populous tribe of Judah, but with it came the small, contiguous tribe of Benjamin, which was so closely identified with Judah as to be almost a part of it, and which divided with Judah the possession of Jerusalem. The Levites also came to Rehoboam in order that they might still worship in Jerusalem, for, as Josephus, the Jewish historian, explains, "they were not willing to worship the heifers Jeroboam had made." Rehoboam, in strengthening his kingdom, built large cities in the tribe of Benjamin, and garrisoned and provisioned them and thus aided in every way in cementing the union of Benjamin and Judah.

Rev. R. H. McDade, Oaks, Pa., writes: "I see a small mistake in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The steamship Olympic belongs to the White Star Line, not the Cunard. The former boats are all built in Belfast, the latter on the Clyde in Scotland."

C. J. S., Minturn, Ga. Yes, it is right to give for foreign missions. It is every Christian's duty to help spread the Gospel to the remotest parts of the earth. This is the "Great Commission." We cannot control conditions, but we must do our share, no matter what the conditions are.

From a Kentucky Reader

The Home Library reached me in good condition. I sent the volumes for New Year's remembrances. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and Home Library should be in every home. I have put Dr. Klopsch's picture up between those of Dr. E. O. Guerrant and my son, Dr. D. Clay Lilly. I cannot find words to express my admiration for Dr. Klopsch's work and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I also am pleased with the Calendar—it looks so natural. MRS. C. L. Irvine, Ky.

SUPPOSE

SUPPOSE, my little lady,
Your doll should break her head,
Could you make it whole by crying
Till your eyes and nose are red?
And wouldn't it be pleasanter
To treat it as a joke,
And say you're glad 't was Dolly's,
And not your head that broke?

Suppose your task, my little man,
Is very hard to get,
Will it make it any easier
For you to sit and fret?
And wouldn't it be wiser
Than waiting, like a dunce,
To go to work in earnest
And learn the thing at once?

And suppose the world don't please you,
Nor the way some people do,
Do you think the whole creation
Will be altered just for you?
And isn't it, my boy or girl,
The wisest, bravest plan,
Whatever comes, or doesn't come,
To do the best you can?—Selected.

How to Build Paper Gliders

First of a Series of Articles on Miniature Air Craft
By FRANCIS ARNOLD COLLINS

THE building of a toy glider is as simple as the first folding exercises in the kindergarten. Beginning with very simple models, one soon becomes surprisingly expert in designing and constructing these miniature air craft. With a few minutes' practice you will be able to fashion a paper glider which will fly ten or even twenty times its own length.

It is possible to copy nearly all of the familiar man-carrying aeroplanes. Your first glider, however, should be as simple as possible. A sheet or two of ordinary writing paper or a stiff card and a little paste and a pin or two, is all you will need. The trick of launching is soon caught, and then larger and more complicated models are easily managed.

If you hold a piece of paper horizontally, and let it go, it will not fall straight to the floor. After fluttering for a moment, it will gain some slight support from the air and perhaps glide several feet. Now if you cut the sheet in the form of one of the familiar monoplanes, you will increase its gliding powers while lessening its weight. Let your first glider be copied after the famous Antoinette model. It will look very shipshape and prove an excellent glider.

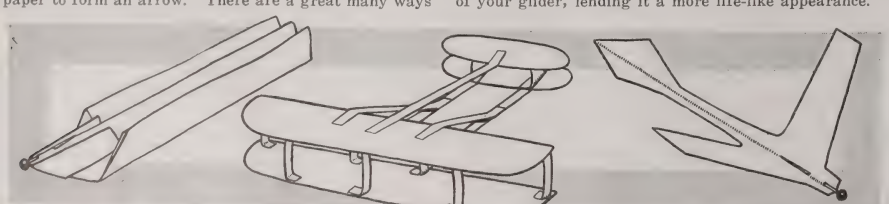
Painting by Miss James

"Louise"
One of the famous "Young America" paintings in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York City

To Increase Its Flying Power

INCREASE its flying power by creasing it slightly in the centre so that the wings form a broad V, or dihedral angle, as it is called. Now, fasten a pin (with a bead or glass head if possible), in the centre of the broader end. Let this model fall from a height of several feet and you will find that the little craft has gained new life. It is easy to underestimate the weight your little air ship will carry. If it does not fly well, use a heavier pin or a paper clip or drop wax or tallow on its prow. When properly weighted, it will sail more than ten times its length. Much depends on the way you launch it. Throw it lightly forward, but do not attempt to force it.

A surprisingly long glide may be made by folding a sheet of paper to form an arrow. There are a great many ways of doing this, and after a little experience with the glider illustrated herewith, you will probably have your own ideas in the matter. Remember that the larger the horizontal surface, the greater is the lifting power, while the vertical surface gives it direction and insures a straighter flight. These arrow models should be weighted at the front, as with the Antoinette model.



The Wright Machine

THE most fascinating of all these models is the Wright machine. From two sheets of paper, cut the diagram indicated in our drawing. The main plane should be separated from the smaller or elevating plane by a distance equal to one-half the greatest width. By cutting both planes and the connecting strips from a single sheet, you will save yourself time and trouble. The plane should be held apart by little struts of paper with the corners turned over and pasted down, always keeping the edge of these little supports lengthwise. The forward or elevating plane should be turned slightly upward, and may be held in this position by running thin slips of paper from the upper surface of the larger plane to the connecting frame. The model will not require any weighting.

To fly the Wright glider, hold it as high as you can and drop it without propelling it, with the smaller plane forward. It should maintain a surprisingly steady horizontal flight for about twenty times its length. If it descends rapidly, elevate the front plane, while if it rises, this plane should be lowered.

Birds and Butterflies

A VARIETY of attractive gliders may be made in the form of birds and butterflies. The principle of these models is the same as in the Antoinette. They should be weighted in front and the front planes or wings tilted upward. The glider will be made very attractive by painting the wings with bright colors or covering them with bright tissue paper. Perhaps you will chance on some picture of a bird, which may be cut out and transferred to the wings of your glider, lending it a more life-like appearance.

How Is Your Own Church?

The Second Instalment of Our Open Discussion for Church Members Generally

IN THIS issue we present another instalment of the flood of very interesting letters that are pouring in upon us in response to our recent invitation to church members to discuss present conditions in their own churches. We would urge intending contributors to make their letters brief:

A Presbyterian Elder's View

The attack on the churches has served a purpose. God uses the wrath of man, criticism and slander to praise him. Men were only in hiding and when God called for Christian manhood the reply came back: "Here am I." Men's ears are becoming unstopped and they are hearing Mott, Spear and Cooper proclaiming II. Timothy 2: 15.

I am a Presbyterian elder, but by virtue of my office as Young Men's Christian Association secretary, I am in touch with all denominations in our little city. I returned here two years ago, after an absence of six years, to find the population doubled and many changes everywhere, but most of all in the churches. Where before have been very primitive church buildings, attended principally by a few faithful women, small Sunday Schools, poorly equipped for work, we now have large modern churches, pipe organs, and good equipment for Sunday School work, but that is not all.

In my own church, which is a fair sample of the churches not only in Coffeyville, but in Independence, Parsons and Fort Scott, our neighboring cities, we have a membership of over 500, a Sunday School enrolment of something more than 400, prayer meetings have an average attendance of 75, of which half are business men, and a Business Men's Bible Class of 60, many members of which are prominent in the business and political life of our city.

The Gospel is being preached in Coffeyville and our pastors are all united in heart and purpose, leading their flocks to greener pastures. The most noticeable advances have been along the line of winning men to Christ. The meetings held by Evangelist Biederwolf in 1909 greatly quickened the spiritual life of the churches. F. L. GEER.

Coffeyville, Kan.

More Active Lay Work Needed

Our church is gaining in membership, and the Gospel is faithfully preached. Still, I am not altogether satisfied with our progress. They have a special meeting or two, lasting a week, each fall, and do all they can to induce people to come into a better way of life and to join the church. The church is enlivened, the membership increased, but lo! that is the end. They do not expect any more additions to the church till the next time, consequently don't get any, though many stirring sermons are preached. I have often wished we could adopt some such method as the city missions. Have it understood that at any and all services, people are expected to be converted and to unite with the church.

Not enough is expected of the laity. The people expect the preacher to do it all, and he doesn't teach them differently. They ought to be organized into bands and called to report or render account of their labors. There is a vast amount of energy lying dormant among the membership. The twin evils, timidity and slothfulness, ought to be cast out and Christians awakened to a sense of their power and responsibility. MRS. NELSON REED.

Gem, Texas.

A Live, Growing Prairie Church

I live in Cimarron County, Oklahoma. This strip was homesteaded about five years ago. I came here with my family three years last fall. With a few others I organized a Sabbath School with twenty-one scholars. We now have an average of about sixty-five. Two years ago a young minister organized an M. E. class of nine members, which has grown steadily until we have now about sixty communicants. Our prayer meetings are good and we often have conversions at the meeting. We also have young people's meetings, with great spiritual interest. J. R. POTTENGER.

Marcella, Okla.

Indifference a Foe to Spiritual Progress

In 1844, the M. E. church was organized in our small country town. It is the only church. Many persons have been converted under its roof and have gone out in the world, living Christian lives, and some have gone to their eternal reward. Many powerful revivals have been held. For the last few years, we have been losing members on account of contentions and strife. The Gospel has been faithfully preached, but the people have been indifferent. Rev. S. W. Andrews, our present pastor, a godly man, has been holding special revival services and the few faithful members of the church have been spiritually renewed. There are people enough in this town and the vicinity to fill the church, but they are not interested. The main trouble is that members, when the time comes for a spiritual refreshing, are absent. Lately our church has been stirred to new spiritual activity. The refreshing has reached the other point on the charge at Perryville. On last Sunday morning forty came to the altar there. A Revival the Church's Great Need

The Year Book of the Methodist Episcopal Church for 1910 shows an increase in membership of only 1 1-5 per cent., or one to every hundred members. Each of the new members represents a cash outlay of $519 in administrative expenses, and a property valuation of $4,779. I am pastor of a Methodist Church in a town of 1,100, on the State line between Minnesota and South Dakota. My church gained in membership last year 25 per cent., or twenty times as many as the denominational average, yet I have the conviction that our church's greatest need is a revival, for only 122 out of a following of about 450 are members of this church. Some Christians, who belong to other churches, worship with us; yet there are scores living without Christ all around us. I believe the Gospel is faithfully preached, and it is the "old Gospel," too. We have a modern Sunday School, graded and using graded helps, which furnishes many additions to the church annually. Our church is gaining steadily. Protestant denominations lack the spirit of co-operation in the West, hence many of the towns are over-churched. If we would work more for the kingdom and God's glory and less for denominational prestige, we could have larger churches, better ministers because better paid, and more effective work done. Protestants have to apologize for their buildings almost everywhere. (REV.) JAMES A. GEER.

The Old Gospel Still Potent

I am a Lutheran pastor of three churches. Two are rural and one a village church. They are gaining in membership slowly. It has always been my conviction to preach the law and the Gospel in its purity, and I have accordingly tried to put it forth in its entirety and simplicity. Our congregations are making spiritual progress. I can discern a steady growth in the knowledge and experience of the truth of God's Word. We have also had the joy of seeing sinners kneel before God's altar and confess their sins. Those same persons have accepted Christ as their personal Saviour and have shown by their lives that they have been transformed from darkness unto light. As to the means that have helped them most, it is the continued repetition of the "old, old story" of the Christ who died for men. There is no other cure for evil. There is no other food for the soul. The Gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one who believes.

I wish to congratulate THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on the stand it takes in regard to sound orthodox Christianity. It is the only stand to take. All other religions will crumble.

In our churches, we employ such as are able to take charge of the work when I am not able to be with them. And if it were not for that, it would be impossible to have charge over three congregations. To employ the laity, I find, is a great help to further the good cause. (REV.) EDW. S. HOVLAND.

A Lutheran Churchman's View

I reside and have traveled among Norwegian Lutheran churches. They are divided up into six different parties. Their main work seems to be to gain territory, membership, and financial foothold. To become one and to love each other is a forgotten item. In a nutshell, our church of to-day has dropped back to lifeless formalism and ritualistic doctrine. Spiritual life, which should be the main life nerve, seems to be largely lost sight of. Building of churches and theological colleges is overdone, in proportion to each party's financial means. Under such condition, spiritual progress can not be advanced with best results. The poor of these churches are in most cases turned over to the county poor farm, and there is in general a very poor spiritual nursing for those of advanced age.

I believe that to secure needed reform, we should throw out merely human dogmas, doctrines and ritualism and let only the Bible—mainly the New Testament—be our guiding Star for all the people. Then we may look for one belief, one baptism, in a convinced and regenerated spirit, where one can exclaim as in former times, "I once was blind, but now I

EASY CHANGE
When Coffee Is Doing Harm.

A lady writes from the land of cotton of the results of a four years' use of the food beverage—hot Postum.

"Ever since I can remember we had used coffee three times a day. It had a more or less injurious effect upon us all, and I myself suffered almost death from indigestion and nervousness caused by it.

"I know it was that, because when I would leave it off for a few days I would feel better. But it was hard to give it up, even though I realized how harmful it was to me.

"At last I found a perfectly easy way to make the change. Four years ago I abandoned the coffee habit and began to drink Postum, and I also influenced the rest of the family to do the same. Even the children are allowed to drink it freely as they do water. And it has done us all great good.

"I no longer suffer from indigestion, and my nerves are in admirable tone since I began to use Postum. We never use the old coffee any more.

"We appreciate Postum as a delightful and healthful beverage, which not only invigorates but supplies the best of nourishment as well." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

A Live and Growing Church

The Munsey Memorial M. E. Church, South, of this place is trying earnestly to do its share towards extending the kingdom of Christ in these parts. It has grown in the past few years from 300 to 600 members. It has a Sunday School of over 400 members; a plant consisting of a church building and parsonage, built in the last four years, worth $75,000. We had a revival just before Christmas, which resulted in about eighty additions to the church. We have one or two revivals each year and the slogan of the M. E. church, South, in this country now is for a sweeping revival all over the church. While the church is not doing all it might or could do, I think I am safe in saying that it is moving forward. Her influence is for good. Our pastor (Rev. S. B. Vaught) is a tireless worker. In fact no Christian should ever be content to sit idly by while there is so much work to be done in this world so full of sin and death. J. C. KING.

Worldly Pleasures Versus the Gospel

Most of the churches are losing in membership. The Gospel is faithfully preached, but the people care very little to hear the Gospel. The people care more for the pleasures of the world. I wonder if Christ would come to our churches would he be a welcome guest?

Ironaton, Ala. I. W. PAINE.

From a Congregational Worker

Our church (Congregational) is gaining in membership. The Gospel is faithfully preached. We are making spiritual progress, caring for the poor, etc.

Jesus has been wonderful to me, since I took him at his word to "become as a little child." My four little children would often run to me and tell, with confidence and trust, all the ups and downs in their lives. I do the same to Jesus, my Lord, and instead of talking over with friends the wrongs done me, I talk the little things over with God, and there comes to me peace; oh, such peace!

We are holding cottage prayer meetings. I am sixty-six years of age, and have a blessed mother, who taught me to pray, and who has taken THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for years.

A Poor Church's Struggles

There was a time when our home church had a good membership and regular services with preaching once and twice a month and with a prayer-meeting and a good interesting Sabbath School; but that time has passed. The older members have all passed over to their reward. The church of late years has had no regular minister, and a great portion of the time no minister at all. This is the case at the present time. We have had no regular minister for three years, there being only a few members, and most of them not able to do much financially, and for that reason they are not able to pay a large salary. Our church is called the New Light, or Christian Church. I know we have some good, worthy members, but not enough to build a house for worship, our church being an old abandoned school building. We have tried at different times to build a church, but have never succeeded in raising more than $700. If we could get help we would feel grateful and I believe the Lord would bless the helpers. Spiritually, we have had many happy times in old Nottingham, and I believe the good Lord is just as willing and ready to help us if we could only get some help to get started again. MRS. E. P. MORRICAL.

A Great and Growing Church

The Presbyterian church of Seattle begins the year with the double distinction of ministering to the largest Protestant congregation in the country and the largest Presbyterian congregation in the world. It has a total communicant and non-communicant membership of 6,200. Of the total membership, 4,702 are active residents. Non-residents swell this number to 5,500, and baptized non-communicants bring the total to 6,200. Last year brought 781 new members. The other side of the ledger shows a loss of 197. The pastor, Dr. M. A. Matthews, is an indefatigable worker and a practical Christian. Together with its missions at Green Lake, Greenwood, Georgetown, West Seattle, South Seattle and Yesler, the main church represents a value of $328,000. The prison committee of the church claims credit for converting to the Christian faith two hundred inmates of the county jail. It is impossible to estimate the value of the practical work among the poor of the city, performed by the church and its pastor. Every circle, political, civic and home, has felt the beneficial influence. E. P. KELLEY.

Sacred Song Neglected

We must do something that will bring the Holy Spirit back into our churches. Formality and pride have crushed it out, and there is an element that does not fill the expectations of the people. Going in debt to make our churches attractive, preaching to the people something that is not the genuine Gospel, are some of the hindrances; but the greatest of all is doing away with congregational singing. The only possible way that God's children can ever enter the kingdom of heaven is by the door of the sheepfold, and this is nothing more than the love of God in our hearts. We might preach a thousand years; yet if we never feed the people with the Bread of Life our work would be all in vain.

One of the best and safest ways for a minister to build up his church is to educate his congregation thoroughly in sacred song; make them familiar with the hymns that they may be sung with earnestness. There are more commands in the Bible to sing and praise God than any other. Indeed, many of these beautiful songs are prayers, and if we sing them over and over again they become prayers to us and this is the greatest work that man ever can do—to make men pray. MRS. L. J. CONKEY.

—TAYLOR UNIVERSITY, Upland, Ind., is sending out preachers and missionaries and Christian laymen in increasing numbers. It is now proposed that the university be endowed. The executive board has begun a movement to raise a $200,000 endowment. $3,000 was subscribed by the Board at its meeting. It is hoped that every friend of Taylor University and Christian education will assist the movement.

—MR. J. F. HABBE, Indianapolis, Ind., in forwarding to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD $25 for Dr. Grenfell's Labrador Mission, writes: "If you make acknowledgment please credit $5 to each of our children, Richard, Edith, Ruth, Edwin and Paul. May I assure you that we receive as much, if not more, benefit as ever from reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to which we have been a subscriber now for nearly a quarter of a century."

A MOTHER'S THOUGHT

Written after reading of the suffering mothers and babies of China

MY baby's cheeks are soft and round,
And he sings to himself all day—
But over there, on the Eastern shore,
The babies no longer play.

And mother hearts have lost their joy,
And mother lips their song.
For they are watching their babies starve,
And it takes so long—so long!

So long to see that little face
Grow ghastly thin and gray;
So long to hear the hunger moans,
Grow fainter day by day.

O God! what do we owe to thee!
That thou hast spared our nest?
O God! what must we do for them
To keep alive the rest?

Shall we go on our careless way,
Nor stop to right the wrong,
When only part of what we waste
Would give back the joy and song?

Our Father, take away our rest;
Give not one moment's peace,
Till we've filled those hungry little mouths
And made the horror cease.

Paul Morton Passes Away

PAUL MORTON, president of the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States since 1905, and Secretary of the Navy in the Roosevelt administration, died suddenly in New York City on the evening of January 19. Mr. Morton, who was one of the best-known and respected men in the country, had not been in robust health for the past few months, but he was unaware that anything serious was the matter, until about a month ago, when the examining physician of the company of which he was the head, refused to recommend him for a policy as too great a risk. He found that Mr. Morton was suffering from an initial lesion of cerebral sclerosis, which means a hardening of the arteries of the brain, finally and inevitably producing congestion. Despite this diagnosis Mr. Morton believed his case was far from hopeless, and began to make preparations for an extended European trip, intending to leave early in February. The insidious malady, however, progressed, the victim being unconscious of its advance until seized with the acute attack of cerebral thrombosis, or blood-clotting, which so suddenly caused his death.

The Late Paul Morton

Mr. Morton had a distinguished career and has left a clean record behind him, which it would be well for men under similar conditions to emulate. He was not exactly born with a gold spoon in his mouth, yet he came of parentage who were well able to give him a good start in life by letting him have the advantages which both social and political position confer. His father, J. Sterling Morton, was a large landowner in Nebraska, who finally reached a cabinet position, as Secretary of Agriculture during Cleveland's second term. He instituted what has been known since as Arbor Day.

Paul was born in Detroit in 1857, but when six months old was taken to Nebraska, where he remained on his father's farm until he was sixteen. In 1872 he entered the Omaha offices of the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad as clerk. He rose through different grades until, finally, he held the position of general freight and passenger agent of the system. In 1890 he joined the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, with its subsidiary corporations, and remained six years, at the end of which time he was called to the presidency of the Santa Fé Railroad. He remained in this onerous position until he was appointed Secretary of the Navy by President Roosevelt in 1904. He held the portfolio for a year, then resigned it to accept the presidency of the Metropolitan Street Railroad Company of New York City, but he never assumed the duties of that position. At this time the Equitable Life Assurance Company had just been reorganized, and Mr. Morton was tendered the chairmanship of the executive board, which he accepted.

Mr. Morton was connected with many other leading enterprises at the time of his death. He is survived by a widow and two married daughters.

Power Wanted

WE HAVE not power: we cannot mount and live
Upon the hill-top of the soul's ideal;
With purpose firm we rise, and straightway give
To purpose all the energy we feel
Will lift us to the place of heart's desire;
But e'en before the first day's setting sun
Hath sunk in golden splendor, robed with fire,
We stumble, fall, then quickly backward run
Until, with broken pride, all faith in self departed,
We find ourselves, alas—just where we started.

Lord, grant us power to reach that summit blest,
To brave the storm, and face the flaming fire;
To fight with zeal, as eagle on her nest
Fights for her young with love's own matchless ire;
For, as we rise and leave far down the track
Our gross, the mean, and useless, all behind,
Our lives will grow in beauty, and will lack
None of those wondrous treasures of the mind,
God's gift to souls with lofty purpose stored,
To bless mankind, and magnify their Lord.

Why Workers Need Oatmeal

Because of comparisons made of actual food values, timber cutters in the woods of Maine are now being fed with oatmeal.

The wood cutters employed by the paper mills of Maine until lately were fed little oatmeal.

Then the largest concern placed a new superintendent in charge of 2,000 men. He was intelligent, progressive — he always delved for the facts. That was why he became superintendent.

One of his first steps was to write a prominent chemist for the facts about foods. And he found that oatmeal, as an energy-giver, leads every other grain that grows.

No other cereal is so rich in digestible proteid — the food that muscle work consumes. Nothing else supplies such a degree of endurance.

Now these 2,000 men, in beginning a day of the hardest work, are fed—as the Scotch feed their workers—solely on oatmeal.

Brain Workers

Among college professors we find that 48 in each 50 regularly eat oatmeal.

Nine-tenths of all college students make oatmeal a regular diet.

Among the homes of the highly successful we find that seven-eighths are oatmeal homes.

Inquiries made of 12,000 physicians show that four in each five use and advocate oatmeal.

The reason is this: Phosphorus is the brain's main constituent—the chief food for thought. And no other cereal contains so much organic phosphorus as oats.

Nerve strain requires lecithin — the builder of nerves and nerve centers. Oats are richer in lecithin than any other food that grows.

They who are taxing their brains and nerves naturally crave oatmeal.

Why Children Love Oatmeal

But few mature people so delight in oatmeal as does the growing child. For the child is active in brain and body and, in addition, he is building up both.

The child needs proteid, phosphorus and lecithin more than most men and women. It is that need which gives children their love of oatmeal—the food which supplies the needs best.

For the growing child, and the active adult, the best-balanced food in existence is oats.

Quaker Oats

TO THE HIGHEST BIDDER

Serial Story by FLORENCE MORSE KINGSLEY

XIX—Continued

"WHAT of it?" shouted David. "Why, that seal was used to sign the contract. It's proof positive. That's what it is!"

"My client," said Jarvis coolly, "did not wish to use his own name. I suggested the seal. He used it—at my request."

"Well, you're the man, anyway," David retorted violently. "I insist that you release her—at once. Do you hear? At once!"

"So that she can be free to marry you?" Jarvis asked. His eyes were fixed and glittered strangely.

"Yes! Why not? She's my promised wife."

Jarvis stood silent for a long minute, as if considering David's words. Then he looked up, moving a little toward the door with the manifest intention of bringing the unfruitful interview to an end.

"I cannot say more at present than that I will endeavor to so arrange matters with my client as to meet Miss Preston's wishes," he said.

He looked calmly, dispassionately at David, and again the young man felt himself vaguely humiliated. He had meant to say more, much more; but quite unexpectedly he found himself bidding Jarvis good-night. Then the door closed quietly upon his wrath and discomfiture.

Stephen Jarvis did not at once resume the reading of the thin blue volume which lay face down in the bright circle of lamplight. Instead he walked slowly up and down the room, his brows knit, his sinewy hands locked behind him. He was trying as conscientiously as possible to look at the situation from the viewpoint of the younger man; to find, if possible, in his own conduct some valid excuse for the (to him) intolerable behavior of Whitcomb. While he yet strove with himself a second visitor was announced.

Jarvis received this person with visible reluctance, bade him be seated, and sat down himself, before he opened the conversation with a tentative "Well?" rather impatiently uttered.

"I arrived this afternoon, Mr. Jarvis, and quite fortunately fell in at once with the person in question," the newcomer said.

"Yes," said Jarvis, dryly.

"As I understand my commission," pursued Mr. Todd, "I am to inform myself as to the person's past, his present occupation and habits, and——"

Jarvis made an impatient gesture of assent.

"I want to know all about him," he said. "It is important that I should be informed as to whether he is fitted for a position of trust."

The other man nodded.

"I understand," he said.

"I want to know," pursued Jarvis in a harsh voice, "if the man is truthful, honest, temperate. If, in short, he is the man to be implicitly trusted with—interests of the highest value and importance."

Mr. Todd again assented, his sharp eyes taking in the details of his employer's face and person with professional acumen.

"Mercantile?" he asked briskly, "or professional? There's a difference, you know. Now a man might be something of a braggart, addicted to cigarette smoking, not averse to a temperate use of intoxicants, an occasional——"

"Do you see all this in him already?" demanded Jarvis.

Mr. Todd considered.

"I dined with the young man," he said slowly, "and acquired certain information which may or may not have a bearing on your case."

Jarvis leaned forward, glistening drops of moisture starting out on his forehead.

"Is the man merely a weak fool—weak because untried by any of the deeper experiences of life, and foolish only because he is young? or is he—worse?" he asked in a low voice; "that is what I want to know. Temperamentally the person in question is at odds with myself. I—don't like him. But, understand, I must not rely on my likes and dislikes in this matter. I—am obliged to be—fair to him, at all costs."

"I understand, Mr. Jarvis," assented the detective. "And I will tell you frankly that my own initial impressions—and I have learned to rely somewhat on first impressions as being in the main correct—are that the person referred to is somewhat inconstant, easily led, excitable, with all the faults of youth and—quite possibly"—he paused again to study the face before him—"many of its virtues. He is, on his own testimony, selfish, extravagant, passionate." He shook his head slowly. "I should not," he went on, "care to trust such a man with interests calling for a high degree of business sagacity or—er—let us say industry. I believe it was something of the sort you questioned."

Jarvis threw himself back in his chair. His haggard eyes met the detective's squarely.

"Is the fellow fit to marry a good and pure woman?" he asked. "Could he command her respect and hold her affection? That's test enough for me."

Mr. Todd moved uneasily in his chair.

"Oh, as to that," he hesitated, "there are all sorts of women, you know. Some of 'em like a man all the better—or appear to—if he—well, if he isn't too good, you know. I've known woman," he went on strongly, "to marry a man who'd drink and abuse her, and yet she'd love him and stick to him to the last. There's something queer about women, when it comes to loving a man. His character doesn't seem to count for so much as you'd suppose."

Jarvis assented dryly.

"You think the person in question would be likely to—do as you suggested?"

"It would be a toss-up," said Mr. Todd thoughtfully, "as to whether he'd settle down into a steady, respectable sort of a citizen, or"—he paused to button his coat painstakingly—"the opposite. I'll follow him up a while longer," he went on, "and report from day to day. In a case like this, where you don't feel like trusting your own judgment, it's best to let facts talk."

Mr. Todd looked searchingly into the depths of his hat.

"Facts will talk, you know," he said confidently. "They're bound to. Sooner or later, something comes along that tells the story. I've shadowed many a person in the past as could tell you that, sir, from behind prison bars."

Peg Morrison, emulating, through the long summer months, the shining examples reported in the agricultural papers, found herself half owner of a prodigious yield of onions in the early autumn. Day after day he had toiled amid the long lines of odorous shoots; weeding, when weeding was a back-breaking task under pitiless summer suns, and early and late stirring the baked soil—for the onion specialists laid great stress on intensive cultivation. Viewing the great heaps of shining bulbs, red, yellow, and silver-hued, spread out in the various barns to dry, Mr. Morrison felt inclined to break forth into singing:

Let everlastin' thanks be thine,
For sech a bright displa-a-y
Es makes a world o' darkness shine
With beams o' heavenly da-ay!

Martha Cottle, her maiden countenance coyly shaded by a ruffled pink sunbonnet, and bearing the egg-basket ostentatiously in one hand, paused on the threshold of the barn.

"Why, Mis-ter Morrison," she exclaimed, "what a wonderful harvest of onions! I never saw anything like it."

"This ain't all of 'em, either," quoth Peg, pausing long enough in his labors to wipe the beaded perspiration from his forehead. "The only thing that gits me is what to do with 'em, now't I've got 'em. The' ain't a quarter of 'em out o' the ground yit."

"You should have thought of that before," Miss Cottle said wisely. "If you keep them too long they'll rot or freeze out here."

"They sure will," agreed Peg, with some anxiety. "I've got to do somethin' with 'em quick. I'll bet," he added, "that I've got nigh onto three thousand bushels—two, anyhow. The'd 'a be'n more, only part of 'em didn't come up, an' some was spoiled b' the dry weather. I didn't put in more'n half I intended to, neither. I d'clar I don't see how that thar John Closner, of Hidalgo, Texas, made out to plant an' cultivate thirty-two acres t' onions; an' what in creation he done with twenty-eight thousan' eight hundred bushels when he got 'em raised beats me. The's an awful lot o' onions in a hundred bushels, seems t' me."

Miss Cottle reflected, her eyes on Mr. Morrison's heated countenance.

"I don't suppose," she said, "that you'd care to take any advice from me; but I know what I'd do, if I'd raised all those onions."

"I ain't proud," Mr. Morrison confessed handsomely. "I'd take advice f'om a Leghorn hen, ef it p'intedly hit the nail on the head."

He looked whimsically at the lady, whose earnest attention appeared to be divided pretty evenly between the shining heaps of vegetables and himself.

"I don't believe I shall ever smell onions again without thinking of you, Peleg," Miss Cottle observed sentimentally.

"'Tis sweet to be remembered," quoted Peg, gallantly.

"I was about to inform you that my brother-in-law's nephew is connected with the Washington Market in New York City," said Miss Cottle, with a long, quivering sigh. "I had thought of writing to him, if you cared to have me. I should be glad to do something —for you, Peleg. There! I've said it again."

"It's mighty kind of you to write t' your relation. I'm 'bleeged t' you, ma'am. Washin'ton Market, Noo York City, soun's good t' me. But d'ye s'pose th's folks enough thar t' eat all them onions?"

He shook his head doubtfully.

"Th' loft t' the keeridge house is full of 'em, an' the hay barn floor's covered, an' the's a lot more in the ground, es I was sayin'."

Miss Cottle seated herself on an upturned bushel basket and gazed earnestly at the successful grower of onions.

"I wish to talk to you seriously, Mr. Morrison, on a subject very near my heart," she said. "Will you not sit down on this box"—indicating a place at her side—"and listen?"

"I'd ought t' be gittin' them onions out th' ground," protested Peg, with a wary glint in his eye. But he sat down gingerly on the edge of the box.

"I've been thinking deeply on the situation here on the farm," pursued Miss Cottle. "I do not feel that I am doing right to remain here longer, under the circumstances."

Peg fumbled the rampant locks behind his left ear, in a fashion he had when perplexed.

"Under the circumstances," he repeated dubiously. "The circumstances is all right; ain't they?"

"I appear to have dropped into the position of hired girl to Barbara Preston," pursued the spinster acidly. "I was engaged as housekeeper and caretaker for that boy. She was to go away and stay for five years."

"Mebbe she'll go soon now," hazarded Peg. He shook his head slowly. "Kind o' funny 'bout that business," he murmured. "I dunno who in creation bid her in."

"I shouldn't mind that so much," pursued Miss Cottle, "but——"

She paused dramatically to allow the full force of her remark to fall on the unsuspecting man.

"There's been considerable talk in the village lately—about you and me. It's come to me straight."

"No!" exclaimed Peg, hastily gaining his legs and feeling for his pipe in his rear breeches pocket with agitated haste. "Don't you believe it, ma'am."

"Can you deny," intoned Miss Cottle strongly, "that the subject of your attentions to me was brought up and discussed in Hewett's grocery store less than a week ago?"

"I said it wa'n't so, ma'am; I told 'em the' wa'n't nothin' in it."

"You told them, Peleg Morrison? You denied that you intended to marry me? How could you?"

"W'y, ma'am, you know——"

"You should at least have afforded me the opportunity of denying the report—if it was to be denied."

Miss Cottle buried her face in her hands.

"I supposed," she went on in a smothered voice, "that you had more regard for the sacred feelings of a good woman. I thought, Peleg, you cared—a little—for me."

"Oh, my! What—in—thunder——"

Miss Cottle's strong, determined hand shot out and fastened tentacle-like upon the unfortunate Peleg's sleeve.

"I shall leave this very day—never to return," she said, in a hollow voice, "unless you and I come to an understanding. I cannot endure it longer."

"O Lord!" exclaimed Peg prayerfully.

"I love that dear little boy as if he was my own," pursued Miss Cottle sentimentally, "and I feel that my duty calls me to remain and care for him; but——"

"I reelly hope you won't go on my 'count, ma'am," faltered Peg, moved by these protestations and once more mindful of Barbara's hortations.

"Peleg!" exclaimed Miss Cottle, beatifically, and instantly relaxed upon his shoulder.

"Say, ma'am! You know—reelly, I——"

"I am so happy, Peleg!" gurgled the spinster.

"Wall, I ain't; I——"

"I knew you would understand my feelings."

"But I don't, ma'am. Kindly set down, an'——"

"I shall remain now and do my duty with a light heart. I feel that the arrangement will be much better for all concerned, and I can make you so comfortable, Peleg. You need half a dozen new shirts, and—shall I confess it? I have them nearly completed already."

PIN-HEAD ECONOMY

THERE has recently been going the rounds of the press the story of a great American financier, whose years are reckoned by the score and whose wealth is estimated in the millions, to the effect that he never sees a pin without stopping to pick it up. This habit of petty thrift, we are informed, the great financier learned from his father, who was himself a great financier. This story is hoary with antiquity. It has been told of many other financiers in many other lands. It may or it may not be true—the chances are it is not—but if true it was not a particularly good story when it was first launched. It is kept alive and started on its rounds at regular intervals, under the belief that it carries a moral, a lesson, which the young and old—but particularly the young, who have supple joints and limber backs—may study to their advantage, and by contracting the habit of picking up pins, become in time great financiers themselves.

Inapplicable Maxims

The great Franklin, to whose memory the world ever lifts its eyes and its hat, is, we fear, responsible for a great many economic maxims which, no matter how appropriate in his day, when "it took seven men to make a pin," are entirely inapplicable when time has become more precious and pins are made by the billion without the intervention of a human hand.

Every day we see that men who have shown thrift and self-denial in taking care of their pennies, display an imbecile weakness when it comes to investing their pounds. A penny saved, through lack of courage to spend it wisely at the right time, may be pounds lost.

We would not be understood as underestimating the practical or economic value of a pin, and if one has nothing else to do and has contracted the doubtful habit of walking with his eyes on the ground, he may find comfort in looking about for pins and transferring them to the lapel of his coat. Such acts should be considered relatively. If, however, we dispatched a boy with an important message, and we saw him, instead of hurrying with all speed, stopping to pick up pins, there would be an immediate vacancy in that boy's place, and another boy, less expert in elementary economics but more alive to the work in hand, would have the job.

In connection with the story of the great financier with the pin-picking habit, a great New York daily paper published the photograph of a man's hand, with a great heap of intertwined hair pins on the outstretched palm. The text accompanying this picture, which was labeled "a case of thrift," went on to say that the owner of the hand, and its contents of hair pins, was a clerk who walked every day from his home to his office, and who, "being a careful, observant man," picked up those hair pins from the sidewalk in the shopping district. The inference adduced was that the young man had done something very commendable, and that if he cultivated this habit it must in the end lead him to fortune if not to fame.

But, for ourselves, we strongly incline to the belief that the great financier, or the man, or the boy, who in the rush of our daily lives, can stop to pick up pins, has more time on his hands than is wholesome.

Economic Waste

"American workmen are clever," said a German manufacturer to the present writer, "but they are wasteful. Oh, so very, very wasteful. We could not allow such waste in the Fatherland." Following this, the thrifty German went on to cite many examples of waste he had observed in his travels. Here is a typical case: An American carpenter wanted a joist just nine feet in length. There was a ten-foot scantling that, by cutting off one foot, would just answer the purpose, and there were two five-foot scantlings that could be spliced and made to answer equally well. Now had that carpenter been in Germany, where lumber is comparatively dear and labor comparatively cheap, he would have spliced the two pieces; but being in America, where labor is higher and lumber cheaper, he cut a foot from the ten-foot length, and that foot was regarded by the German as uneconomical and wasteful. But was it? If examined with an eye to ultimate cost, we shall find that in the American's seeming waste there was practised the truest economy, for it resulted in the better output at a smaller expenditure of time, which in this case meant money.

A bright English mechanic with whom we recently had a delightfully instructive conversation said: "My home city, Sheffield, is not progressing, it is going down. The reason? Why, it is because the English manufacturer is afraid of the scrap-heap. He thinks that a machine can only be useless when it is completely broken down, and so he continues using it as a matter of economy, though he may know that the appliance has been superseded by newer and more efficient methods." The Englishman pointed out a building from which two great printing presses were being carried to be consigned to the scrap-heap. "Those presses cost $65,000," he went on. "Today they are practically as good as they were when installed fifteen years ago. If my friends over in Sheffield saw that, they would call it a wicked waste and would hint at the mad extravagance of these over-rich Americans. Now, there is $65,000 gone, and the machines to take their place are costing $125,000; it does look uneconomical and extravagant. But let us look at it: The new presses will occupy less room; they will take about one-half the energy and labor expense to operate them, and the output will be better and three times as great. These men have counted the cost and estimated the profits. They do not bother about pin-head economies and they are not afraid of the scrap-heap."

Wasted Effort

Unfortunately few of us realize that there can be such a thing as economic waste, nor that in our anxiety to conserve little things that have become familiar, we are blinded to the larger things that lie beyond. It is well, if the time cannot be spent to more advantage, to go on patching the harness till ropes and shreds have taken the place of the original material. The old plow, cultivator, harrow or other farm tool may have long since been superseded by a far better device, but so long as the primitive article answers after a fashion, why spend good money on a "newfangled notion"? Why, indeed, do anything that is progressive? Why not lie back in the old ruts and do the old thing in the old way, rather than open one's eyes to the fact that what is a wicked waste to the old fogy is a wise economic movement to the man who is winning because he is abreast of the times?

We do not propose to wipe the dear old economic maxims from our copybooks, but neither do we propose to accept them unquestioningly as guides to success. We are no longer—if, indeed, it was ever done—hiring our clerks and workmen from the shabby fellows we see picking up pins on the street. We are looking about for the strong, vigorous men who walk erect and look upward, not because they are indifferent to pins as such, but because in the life battle their minds are fixed on things better worth achieving.

An Army of One Victorious*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE battle between Elijah alone on the one hand, and the corrupt king and queen with the wicked priests and weak people on the other, is repeated in miniature in every human soul, where Conscience stands alone as the prophet for God against the sinful appetites and passions which rage for mastery. In the combat against sin if we wish God to win in our souls we must turn to him in prayer before the altar cross of Calvary. He knows what is best for us. His ways may be inscrutable to our finite comprehensions, may be mysterious to our weak judgments; but in the final analysis we perceive in them a loving design. It was his kindness to bring back Israel from the erring way of sin by sending a judgment upon the nation in the three and a half years of drought. He proved to the people that the false gods, Baal and Astarte, who they thought had special charge of agriculture, had no power to aid them or remove the calamity. Thus did he bring them back to their true allegiance to himself and dependence upon his bounty. God always keeps his promises, not alone to reward but also to punish.

In the story of Elijah, the minor figure of Obadiah is worthy of some consideration, because there are many who, while they cannot become Elijahs, can enact the role of Obadiah. The two men were as different as Abraham and Isaac. When the great drought came upon Israel and people were dying by the wayside, King Ahab determined to make search of the whole land if perchance there might be one spring or brook not yet dried up. He divided the task with Obadiah, who seems to have been a sort of prime minister; each man was to search his half of the kingdom. Obadiah found no water, but he found Elijah, for whom King Ahab searched in vain in order to kill him for prophesying judgment upon Israel. Obadiah, it appears, had been quietly true to God, even in Ahab's household, which, by the way, shows us that, no matter in what position we may be placed, it is not impossible to serve God—we can be saints in evil surroundings, as many have been.

The Moral Courage of Elijah

When Elijah bade Obadiah tell Ahab that he, Elijah, would await the king at a certain place, Obadiah feared that the prophet would disappear in the meantime and he himself be slain as having deceived the king—a circumstance which shows us that we should carefully distinguish between cowardice and reasonable prudence. Obadiah illustrated a case of the latter. He showed an exemplary combination both of courage and prudence. Being assured that Elijah would really meet Ahab face to face at the place appointed, he arranged the meeting, and "My Lord Elijah," as Obadiah called him, one of nature's true nobility, met as a superior, as an ambassador from the King of Kings, the wicked Ahab, who had wasted in selfishness and sin the great opportunity that comes with every political office to be of service to humanity. Ahab is challenged to put to the test the imported religion that Queen Jezebel has brought as her evil dowry. This other David will meet the Philistines of a foreign, false and foul religion on Mount Carmel. The time is appointed and he is not found wanting. Hundreds of priests and prophets of Baal are there frantically praying, piercing their bodies with knives and evidently sincere in their false faith; they are willing to shed their blood in behalf of their belief, a fact which proves to us that sincerity is no saviour. The man who takes poison, presuming it to be medicine, does not escape the consequence by his sincerity.

The wild pleadings and exhortations of the devotees of false gods were in vain. After a whole day of agonizing prayers by hundreds of bleeding priests, there was neither voice, nor any to answer, nor any one that regarded. Is such a conclusion not pitiful in face of the faith they reposed in their false divinities? What then shall we say when we must make the same infinitely sad summary of millions of prayers of many false faiths in many lands expressed not alone in bleeding bodies, but in broken hearts for long centuries? Even in our own land are many whose lives are as heathen as the prophets of Baal; and this is due to the fact that most of us have failed to enact Elijah's part in manifesting by divine courage the true faith.

In contrast to the long and loud but vain prayers of the false priests, Elijah's brief, quiet prayer brings the fire that burns stone and water and dust as well as sacrifice—symbol of the purging of soul and body when in answer to penitent and trustful supplication the Holy Spirit takes possession of a human soul. The vanity of Baal-worship and the power of Jehovah as the true God having been demonstrated, the people revolted against king and queen and priests, shouting: "Jehovah, he is God!" Thus for a time, government of the people by the people for the people prevailed.

The Heroism of Everyday Life

The lesson of Elijah in meeting the worshipers of Baal and Astarte is one which inculcates a sublime courage. Courage is one of the greatest qualities man can possess, and one of the most advantageous. Everybody admires it and perhaps none more so than the coward himself, who longs to discover the secret of that which he lacks, but praises in others. In the past, courage has been too largely associated with the killing of men in merciless and unnecessary wars. Be it ours to glorify the courage shown in saving men! The undertaking of the missionary is heroic. The missionaries aim high, they risk life to save life, and as a consequence their labors never end in failure, but always in success. We need heroes of war once or twice in a generation, but heroes of peace find opportunity every day in the year. A man working on one of the railroads in the State of Indiana discovered, one morning, that the bridge had fallen, and he remembered that the train was due. He started down the track to meet it, saw it coming, and raising his hands, pointed to the bridge, but on it came, having no time to lose. He threw himself across the track, and the engineer, thinking him a madman, stopped the train. The man arose and told his story, and saved the lives of hundreds.

At a fire in Jersey City a young man found the path of duty leading to death, but he did not hold back. He was twenty-three years of age, and known as "the boy policeman." It was three o'clock in the morning when he found an apartment-house on fire. Beating an alarm on the doors with his night-stick, he led several families out to safety, guiding and half-carrying some panic-stricken women and children past the eager flames. Then other officers and firemen came, and the fight began for mastery over the cruel element. The policeman went back into the building to make sure that all the inmates had escaped. When the fire was subdued they found him dead. It is a simple story, oft matched in its heroism in the annals of peace, but

The big "Limited" waits for no man. It moves out on the tick of the second.

Set your time-piece by the starting signal or by the conductor's watch—and you have HOWARD time. The point is right there. You can start with HOWARD time but the chances are that you can't keep it unless you carry a HOWARD Watch.

The HOWARD is the greatest Railroad Watch in the world. Whether a HOWARD is worth while for you depends not on your occupation but on the kind of man you are. If you are an "any time" man, any watch will do; if you are an accurate man, you want a HOWARD—with its splendid adjustment to five positions, temperature and isochronism.

That means authoritative time.

The gain in self-respect is worth more than the investment.

The price of each watch—from the 17-jewel (double roller) in a Boss or Crescent gold-filled case at $40 to the 23-jewel in a 14k solid gold case at $150—is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD Watch. Find the HOWARD jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know.

Drop us a postal card, Dept. W, and we will send you "The Story of Edward Howard and the First American Watch"—an inspiring chapter of history that every man and boy should read.

worthy of as much memorial honor as the bravest deed on the bloodiest battlefield.

The heroism and courage most likely to be overlooked are those which are encountered every day in ordinary walks of life. Greater than any kingly dragon-slayer of old is the man who overcomes an unholy passion, sets his foot upon it, and stands serene and strong in virtue. Grander than Zenobia is the woman who struggles with the love that would wrong another or degrade her own soul, and conquers. The young man, ardent and tender, who turns from the dear love of woman, and buries deep in his heart the sweet instinct of paternity to devote himself to the care and support of aged parents or an unfortunate sister, and whose life is a long sacrifice in manly cheerfulness and majestic spirit, is a hero of the rarest type.

The young woman who resolutely stays with father and mother in the old home, while brothers and sisters go forth to happy homes of their own; who cheerfully lays on the altar of filial duty that costliest of human sacrifices, the joy of loving and being loved, is a heroine.

The husband who goes home from everyday routine and the perplexing cares of business with a cheerful smile and a loving word to his invalid wife; who brings not against her the grievous sin of long sickness, and reproaches her not for the cost and discomfort thereof; who sees in her languid eyes something dearer than girlish laughter—in the sad face and faded cheeks that blossom into smiles and even blushes at his coming, something lovelier than the old-time spring roses—is a hero nobler than knight of old.

The Secret of True Courage

What is the secret of this courage we see in everyday life? We are bound to admit that some professing Christians are far from courageous in many things, while seemingly irreligious people display a rare bravery at momentous crises and on crucial occasions. There are many cases, however, like Peter's, where a natural coward has become a moral hero through a spiritual experience, a vision of God. "How can we fear anything with him looking on?" This is what explains the fearlessness of Nathan before David, of Elijah before Ahab and Jezebel, of Jeremiah before Zedekiah, of John the Baptist before Herod and Herodias, of Paul before Nero, of Luther before the Diet, and of John Knox before Queen Mary. In all these men in some less degree was that same vision of God which made Christ fearless before Pontius Pilate and the mob. See God and fear nothing is the open secret of the noblest courage.

One of courage can accomplish wonders when God is on his side. In the choice between the altar of Baal and that of Jehovah the vote on the first ballot stood 849 to 1 in favor of Baal, but the one with God proved a victorious majority. So to-day it often happens that one prophet stands alone for some moral reform which the law requires, but which a wicked and adulterous generation disregards.

Abraham alone stood out against the idolatry of his family and neighbors and countrymen; but he won against them all, and founded a nation which was destined to lead the whole world in religion. Joseph, the only worshiper of Jehovah in the land of Egypt, confessed his faith before an idolatrous Pharaoh and his idolatrous court, and won the premiership, with its great opportunity for blessing the world. Samson, as an army of one, defeating a thousand Philistines; Jonah, as an army of one, marching on Nineveh and bringing the city to its knees, are stories that repeat themselves on an even more wonderful scale in the spiritual, moral and civic life of our time.

and the question now is whether or not Kovite is a suzerainty of Turkey. Nominally it is; but England holds that there is no evidence that Kovite ever paid tribute to the Turk and that therefore she is not a real vassal. Further it is declared that the Turk never cared to assert the claim until now, when there is a chance to sell it to a European power.

Farther up the gulf is a stream called the Khon. On its banks are two or three towns of interest, the two largest being Umkhaza and Sobeir. The former is almost as desirable a place to hold as Kovite, and through English influence, the Sheik of Kovite is endeavoring to prove his right to be regarded as ruler of the place. Here, too, Turkey might get a terminus for the Bagdad Railway, but England objects, although it is probable that one of these two points will ultimately be the terminus of the road.

On the Persian side of the gulf, there are also complications. There are a few important towns there. Near the base of the gulf is Lingha, a point of distribution for the Arab trade. The coast, on the Persian side, is lowland, running back to a mountainous plateau. The water is shallow, save at spots where the mountains reach the river's edge. There are no wharves, and goods must be lightered a mile and a half from ship to shore. Lingha is sheltered by two islands in the gulf. These towns on the coast are not really Persian, but Arab, and one sees the simple Arab red flag floating above them. The Persian does not dwell on the lowlands. Even the Persian governors here are usually half-breed Arabs. Persia, however, gets good customs revenues from these ports, though she has a hard time collecting them. Some time ago she gave the collection of customs over to the Belgians, in the same manner in which England took charge of the Chinese customs. This step was taken because she could give them to neither England nor Russia, without one or the other objecting, and besides Belgium has no territorial ambitions. The Arabs, however, were dissatisfied, as this made the price of goods landed on the Persian side higher than goods landed on the English coast strip, where the duty was only five per cent. Hence, Persian towns are declining, and the people of Lingha even talk of migrating to Bassador on the island of Bisham, where a few acres belong to England. Here they could open a trading town. The site has several reservoirs, a large cemetery, and the remains of an old Portuguese town. There they would be under a British protectorate, with no customs beyond five per cent., so the Linghans may yet take this move. The present trade of Lingha amounts to $7,500,000 yearly.

Beyond Lingha there is the port of Bundar Abbas, which Russia hopes to secure as terminus of the Russian railway across Persia. England opposes this giving of Bundar Abbas to Russia, though the British Liberals claim that England and Russia could work together there. The Conservatives, on the other hand, hold that this would put a Russian fleet at Bundar Abbas, and would interfere seriously with the British route to India. Bundar Abbas is sheltered by an island, and would make an elegant harbor, after the building of a large breakwater, at an expense of less than a fourth of that spent by the Russians at Port Arthur. Bundar Abbas is a trade centre for introducing goods into Persia, being the end of the caravan route to Teheran and to the old capital of Persia. In 1901 the trade amounted to $3,000,000, but the route became dangerous later, and traffic has declined, though a few years ago trade had been up to $3,500,000. Russia, to preserve her interests, pays $25,000 every two months to subsidize a steamer carrying only $10,000 worth of goods.

From the gulf, one goes by camel or donkey across the dreaded salt plains to Teheran. Transportation costs about $10 a ton from Bundar Abbas to Yezd, or five times the average of the railway traffic, so that a railroad would enormously reduce freights. And so, on the railways of the future Persia is now building her hopes.

As soon as you earn money enough and have one machine paid for, buy another, hire other men and let them make $10 or $15 a day for you. Getting one of these machines and hiring a man to run it, beats working for a living to a standstill. Be "Johnny on the Spot" with a machine and get the cream of the business. If you can get a number of these machines working, they should make you rich. We believe there never has been a machine placed on the market that has so pleased everybody, met with such immediate success, and made so much money, as the house cleaning machine, and still they are very little known—for they have only been on the market for a very short time.

You Should Make $2,500 to $3,000 a Year on Each Machine

Two leads of suction hose, thus doing twice the work.

A Perfect Wonder

The Auto Vacuum reaches every crack, corner and crevice of the floor; the cracks in the wall, the ceiling and mouldings. It cleans and renovates bedding, comforts, blankets, mattresses and pillows; the cracks or crevices in wooden and iron beds; even the dust, fuzz and other accumulation in the tightly coiled woven wire springs. It reaches and cleans such inaccessible places as trunks linen closets, desks, document files, pigeon-holes, radiators, registers, etc., etc.

We have seen it pull out pail after pail of dirt from houses—dirt that was impossible to remove completely by the ordinary means of beating, etc. When it is working on the streets, the dirt and filth pouring through the observation glass attracts a crowd of people that look with wonder. They would not believe it possible. The ordinary house can be cleaned by two men with an Auto Vacuum House Cleaner in from one to four hours, and when the work is finished all of the furnishings will be in their original places.

Most Practical Machine Ever Built

The Auto Vacuum House Cleaner consists of a powerful gasoline engine rated at over 12 Horse Power—4 cycle—two cylinder, 5-inch stroke, made from the best close grain cast metal, bored and reamed to the minutest detail; manganese bronze rods, babbitted pin ends; perfectly adjusted best metal crank shaft. Newest oiling devices, positive and perfect lubrication; the carburetor, commutator, spark coil and all other fittings the best on the market—making an outfit so complete and reliable that anyone could run it.

The whole is erected upon a substantial four wheeled, covered wagon propelled by its own power so that it can be moved from place to place and is equipped with vacuum condenser, water tank, vacuum gauge, two high-pressure suction hose, observation glass and cleaning tools, all properly connected and adjusted ready for work. The most practical and perfect machine of its kind ever built. Far exceeds this description.

Fitted with covering as shown in picture at top.

This sign on your machine will advertise you and should bring you enough customers to keep you busy all the time.

"The machine is proving a great success—everything is turning out the way you said it would."—H. Bolinger. Mr. Hunter paid for 2 machines, paid all running expenses and saved $1400 in 3 months. "Have plenty of work. Machine is doing fine."—G. C. Woodworth. I have worked 6 or 7 days and cleared about $80."—J. E. Ryan. "From March 1st the machine has averaged $25 per day."—F. Smith. "We have taken in at the rate of $100 per week since we started."—F. F. Moe. I have made $175 in 2 weeks."—Frank S. Wilhite.

Pay For it out of Your Profits

We want you to investigate our more than liberal offer. We do not believe there is any business where so small an investment will bring such wonderful returns. Actual records show that these machines have already proved tremendous money makers. You will be as delighted and pleased with it as others who have tried it and made a success.

We have such implicit confidence in the wonderful money-making powers of the Auto Vacuum House Cleaner that we will ship one to any live man, who is honest and willing to work, on 30 days trial—and upon such liberal terms that it is next to impossible to lose. We will even go further and allow you to pay for it in installments, and in such a way that your profit should easily take care of your payments.

In Our Illustrated Book we give full particulars as to how to organize your business, solicit orders, what to charge for the work and how to turn every minute of your time into money. We will send it to you free. Every ambitious man who has any "get up" in him should write at once for this book. A postage stamp will bring it to you and it will show you how you can become independent and one of the prosperous men in your community. Write at once.

Neighborliness*

MANY new additions to our stock of pithy sayings have come to us from Abraham Lincoln. Through all of them breathe the strong common sense and the loving heart of our great war President.

"Malice toward none. Charity toward all," is one of the oftenest quoted.

The Hon. H. C. Deming, of Connecticut, has said that in his presence, Mr. Lincoln once made this impressive remark, "I have never united myself with any church, but when one will inscribe over its altar, as its sole qualification for membership, the Saviour's condensed statement of the substance of both law and Gospel, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind, and thy neighbor as thyself,' that church will I join."

Our Saviour was ever enjoining upon his disciples that he who would save his life must lose it; the shepherd must leave the ninety-and-nine to seek the one that was lost, and he that hath abundance must "sell that he hath and give alms."

In a certain ancient town the great cathedral had a chime of bells. The time arrived when a new bell must be cast. This new bell was to exorcise the demons from the town and call the people to morning worship.

The bell had arrived at the point when it was to be cast in the mould, and the people were full of joy. Priests brought quantities of bronze and other metals, and the molten mass began to make its way toward the great hole in which the cast was being prepared.

Suddenly there was an outcry, and a sense of failure ran through the vast throng which was assembled to witness the great casting.

"Bring more metal!" cried the men who were in charge. "Bring your gold and your silver. We have not sufficient metal."

Instantly there was hurrying in all directions. Women brought their bracelets and earrings. Men hastened forward, bearing vessels of silver and gold. The priests took the sacred articles from the sanctuary. All flung their treasures into the mighty melting-pot until there was enough.

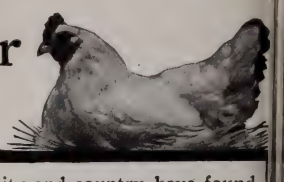
Then the great bell cooled, and at last it was swung into the tower; and the legend relates that the people from all the cities around came to hear the notes of that beautiful bell; for the sacrifices of those who had yielded up their dearest and best treasures, had made its sound sweeter than that of harp or viol.

"Thus," said the Rev. E. C. Bolles, when he told this story at a soldiers' reunion, "does the new liberty bell, which testifies to our reunited country, sound in our ears. Let us not forget that it is sweet because of the sacrifices which were made to obtain it, and that much of its sweetness comes from Abraham Lincoln, who cast into it the gold of his manly life."

All that we have when life is over, is what we have done for others. The man in the next house is your neighbor—but so equally is the man in the street. Love to God implies love to that man—perhaps low and degraded, but no less your brother.

And on this anniversary of the birth of our beloved Lincoln, let us especially remember him as the tender and loving brother, to whom no hurt to any soul was unfelt.

This was why he was so mourned—because he was kind and believed that every man was his neighbor.



By heroic hearts it is counted as a crown,
When a victor soul lays its shining armor down;
That there floweth world-wide sorrow,
With a love no prince could borrow,
Doth afford the tenderest homage of renown.

"Keep chickens,"
says the FARM JOURNAL, and live better at less cost.

THOUSANDS of families, in city and country, have found this the easy way to IMPROVE their standard of living, and at the same time LOWER THE COST. With chickens you always have delicious food, for the family or for "company." Their eggs supply you with ready money or ready food. They are pets that pay their board. By keeping chickens, boys and girls can earn money, and also get an excellent training. Sometimes the back-yard plant grows into a large business, like those of CORNING, CURTISS, and FOSTER, who make many thousands of dollars a year.

Raising chickens pays if you know how, whether you keep a dozen hens, or run a large poultry-farm; but you need the best guides. Many get from their chickens less than HALF as much as they might get with the guidance of any of these three splendid modern poultry-books, which tell the experience and methods of the most successful modern poultry-raisers.

These methods have all been tested by actual experience and proved successful. The FARM JOURNAL stands back of them, for it has investigated them and KNOWS. They can be used with six hens or six thousand. Of the Corning Egg-Book alone, OVER 100,000 COPIES were sold in one year. Many are using these methods with splendid success and profit.

The Corning Egg-Book is the great guide-book for back-yard chicken-raisers. It tells how two city men in poor health, with no experience, starting with thirty hens, built up in four years an egg business which in one year, with 1933 hens, made an average profit of $6.41 a year per hen. These men learned how to make hens lay the most eggs in winter, when they get 60 and 70 cents a dozen. This book tells how they found the best breed, why they raise only white-shelled, sterile eggs, how they keep hens LAYING ALL WINTER, when they hatch chicks to do their best laying in January, how to mix the feed that produces most eggs, and how their whole system works to that one end,—eggs, EGGS, EGGS. It gives photographs and complete working plans of their buildings, which you can build IN SECTIONS, large or small as needed.

Curtiss Poultry Book tells how Roy Curtiss, a farmer's boy, starting with a few neglected hens, has built up at NIAGARA FARM one of the best-paying poultry plants in the world. Roy agreed that if his father would furnish feed, he (Roy) would supply eggs and chickens for the farm table, and all left over were to belong to him. The two years Roy was going so much feed that his father had to give quits, but the boy stuck. His brother joined him, and the business grew and grew. But they had no guidance, and had to learn by their own mistakes. Such a guide as the Curtiss Poultry Book would have saved them thousands of dollars. This capital book was written right at Niagara Farm by the veteran poultryman, Michael K. Boyer. He says he never saw a general poultry plant so well managed. Every day shipments go off, every day money comes in. Their percentage of fertile eggs, of live, strong chickens hatched, of day-old chicks shipped without loss, is really wonderful. This book gives all their methods and feed formulas, tested and improved by years of experience. Many pictures. Whether you raise chickens, ducks, or eggs, have a dozen fowls or thousands, you will find in this book help that you can get in no other way.

"Poultry Secrets" is a remarkable collection of successful "wrinkles" in poultry-raising, secured and edited by MICHAEL K. BOYER (known to poultrymen as "Uncle Mike"). Many of these were treasured secrets of famous poultrymen, guarded with jealous care because of their great value. We paid hundreds of dollars for them. This is the SEVENTH EDITION, and thousands are using these methods with great profit.

W. R. Curtiss tells his successful method of hatching 50 per cent. more pullets than cockerels; the Philo System is described and explained; the "15-cents-a-bushel" and "8-cents-a-bushel" green feed secrets; secrets of the Angell, Palmer, and Hogan systems; Boyer's method of absolutely insuring fertility of eggs for hatching; Townsend's system for preventing death of chicks in the shell; Felch's famous mating chart, suppressed for many years; feeding and fattening secrets; and MANY OTHER PRICELESS SECRETS, are here disclosed for the first time.

ANY ONE of these books, and Farm Journal balance of 1911 and all of 1912,	ANY TWO of the books, and the Farm Journal for three years,	ALL THREE of the books, and Farm Journal for two years,
50 cents	$1.00	$1.00

Be sure to say plainly WHICH BOOK or books you want.

Farm Journal is the standard paper for everyone who grows or wants to grow fruit, vegetables, poultry or stock of any kind. It is 33 years old, and has over 750,000 subscribers, in all parts of the country. "Judge Biggle" and "Peter Tumbledown" are characters far better known to many than Hamlet or Micawber. It has a fine poultry department, more valuable than most poultry papers. It is a favorite paper with housekeepers. Clean, clever, cheerful, amusing, intensely practical. Cut to fit everybody, young or old, village, suburbs, or rural routes. Unlike any other paper and always has been.

On any one-dollar offer, if your order is mailed within TEN DAYS of the date of this paper, we will send you also the famous Poor Richard Almanac for 1911, full of wit and wisdom for the rural home. Address your letter just like this:-

Great Lives: Joseph*

A GOOD old minister used often to say, "There are only two perfect men described in the Old Testament. One of them is Joseph. The other is Joshua."

A critical mind might consider that Joseph was not quite kind in all his ways; but on the whole, it is a rather mean spirit which would find fault with him.

He was a grand and noble hero, and the story of his life, as related in the simple language of the Scriptures, forms one of the important dramatic tales of literature, as well as an invaluable link in the great chain of events which led up to the mighty climax of Christ's coming.

There is something peculiarly offensive to the just modern taste in the way of the ancients, and even those of later times, of singling out for special love and favor one child above another.

Even if the parental heart will inevitably incline toward one child more than toward his brothers and sisters, no just parent of our day will allow the fact to appear. The anguish of neglected, undervalued and misunderstood children has been too often and too vividly experienced and depicted in our day, to allow a conscientious parent to show partiality. (See James 3: 17 and Rom. 2: 11.)

In home or in school such a course is now seen to be wrong and sure to breed trouble.

Doubtless Joseph was very beautiful in person, "goodly and well-favored." Of his extraordinary powers of mind the narrative leaves no doubt. He was apparently one of the ablest of men, and gifted with tact and that indefinable charm called "manner" no less than with brains.

Dignity and stateliness must have characterized him in no small degree. His hold upon the proud and elegant Egyptians plainly indicates his possession of an imposing and majestic presence.

It was no wonder that with these remarkable qualities, his aged father loved him above his brethren, though he should never have shown his partiality. Benjamin, though the child of the same cherished mother, figures in the narrative as a weak and colorless figure beside his famous and forceful brother.

As no doubt there were among the older sons handsome and gifted ones also, it is not strange that they resented their father's open favoritism toward Joseph.

It was a strange thing that the "Lawgiver," "Shiloh," should have been descended from Judah, rather than from this wonderful Joseph—so much greater and more talented and less sinful than his brethren. In numbers, the mighty tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh combined exceeded any of the other eleven, but, after all, the chief glory went to Judah, one of the brethren who would have sold Joseph into Egypt.

Surely all the slights offered to Leah and to her sons, and to the other sons of Jacob, were more than atoned for by the glorious destiny vouchsafed to the line of Judah.

We cannot entirely understand these strange and beautiful old stories; but they are full of lessons for us all.

The tender heart, the magnanimity, the filial loyalty of Joseph formed an object lesson which rings down the centuries. His must have been a patient and observing mind. He must have dipped deep into the wonderful learning of the wonderful people among whom his lot was cast. Otherwise he could not have held the great power, constantly increasing it, which came to him in Egypt.

The Simplest Gown looks Well on a Figure of Correct Proportion if Carried Well.

You Can Weigh Exactly What You Should Weigh

My pupils are among the most refined, intellectual women of America. They have regained health and good figures and learned how to keep well. Each has given me a few minutes a day in the privacy of her own room to following scientific, hygienic principles of health, prescribed to suit each individual's needs.

No Drugs—No Medicines

My work has grown in favor because results are quick, natural and permanent and because they are scientific and appeal to common sense.

Be Well—nothing short of well.

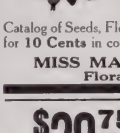
Radiate Health so that every one with whom you come in contact is permeated with your strong spirit, your wholesome personality—feels better in body and mind for your very presence.

Be Attractive—well groomed.

Improve Your Figure—in other words be at your best. You wield a stronger influence for good, for education, for wholesome right living, if you are attractive and well, graceful and well poised—upright in body as well as in mind—and you are happier.



I want to help every woman to realize that her health lies, to a degree, in her own hands, and that she can reach her ideal in figure and poise.

Judge what I can do for you by what I have done for others.

I think I do not exaggerate when I say I have corrected more

Chronic Ailments and built up and reduced more women during the past nine years than any physician—the best physicians are my friends—their wives and daughters are my pupils. I have Reduced about 25,000 women from 10 to 85 lbs. I have rounded out and Increased the Weight of as many more—all this by strengthening nerves, heart, circulation, lungs and vital organs so as to regulate the assimilation of food.

Won't you join us ?—we will make you and the world better.
I have published a free booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly, and giving other information of vital interest to women. Write for it and I will also tell you about my work. If you are perfectly well and your figure is just what you wish, you may be able to help a dear friend—at least you will help me by your interest in this great movement of health and figure through natural means.
Sit down and write to me NOW. Don't wait—you may forget it.
I have had a wonderful experience, and I should like to tell you about it.

DROP IN HIGH PRICES

IT IS safe to say that the era of high prices is over, the ebb has set in, and, so far as may be judged from the present outlook, it will be a long time before the tide rises as high again, if ever, on the produce market.

Several circumstances have brought about this gratifying condition. The first factor is the enormous returns from the agricultural sections of the country. There has never been a more bountiful harvest; farmers have never been as prosperous as at the present. Large yields in almost every kind of crop are reported from the Western States; so that there is little likelihood of scarcity of any production on the markets for the coming year, or until the next harvests are gathered. The second condition which enters into the cut in prices is the fact that the proprietors of the cold storage warehouses, looking forward to a continuance of the high scale, overcrowded themselves, and now are compelled to dispose of their provisions or else suffer a total loss. These men looked too far ahead, or not far enough, and as a consequence they have overreached themselves. In the vernacular of slang, they admit they have been "stung"; but in their "wailing and gnashing of teeth" they will get little sympathy. They boosted prices until even the necessaries, not to speak of the luxuries, of life were beyond the reach of the poor, and they tried their best to keep up those prices, reckless of the consequences in suffering and privation that would ensue to the working classes. Now, their loss from "cornering" (and it is claimed it will be a heavy one) will be a gain to the poorer classes in the low price of supplies; the many will be benefited, and consequently as a whole the country will be much better off.

It is said that the wholesalers in butter alone face an impending loss of $3,000,000, this product having gone down to the lowest figure at which it has been quoted for the past seven years. There are more than 45,000,000 pounds of butter in the warehouses of the country, and the cost of carrying this has been about three cents a pound, which, in face of present prices, will entail the loss stated. It is much the same with eggs. Millions upon millions have been hoarded in the warehouses, and now these must be put on the market. Dealers everywhere admit that the enormous stocks in cold storage force them to the necessity of putting products on the market at a price much below the original cost.

It behooves the poor man, the working man who has a large family to support, to post himself on the state of the market so that he won't be fleeced by retailers and produce "sharps." All round prices are fully one-third less than they were a year ago. The finest fresh creamery butter brings wholesale to-day but twenty-six to twenty-eight cents a pound, and good to fine creamery kind brings but twenty-two to twenty-five cents wholesale; therefore the retailer can make a fair profit by selling the former at thirty cents a pound and the latter at about twenty-eight cents, and the consumer should see to it that he pays no higher. If he does he is allowing himself to be victimized by an extortionist. The best eggs on the market can now be retailed with profit at thirty-five cents a dozen, yet many dealers are still keeping them up and asking fifty and even sixty cents for guaranteed "candled" eggs. The cold storage eggs should not command more than twenty-five cents a dozen, as many of this kind are little better than the "rots and spots" which it was shown recently are used in New York City by nefarious bakers for leavening cakes and bread. These two staple products—butter and eggs—in their best form are now available to the working man's pocketbook. Therefore there is no necessity for his buying oleomargarine or any other inferior product. As for the eggs, the hens will be busy in another month, so will the ducks, and there will be so many eggs on the market that a still lower figure may be quoted for the fresh products. About the same condition obtains in regard to milk. The Milk Trust has tried hard to keep up the price, and is trying hard, but it is certain to get a tumble also. On account of the trust boosting the price the consumer cut down the quantity, and as a consequence the supply has been in excess of the demand. Cream has had to be converted into butter or put in cold storage. Several wholesalers, despite the efforts of the trust, are coming down. One dealer who has been charging nine cents a quart has entered into a contract with a large restaurant to supply the milk at five cents a quart.

Of course it follows that the drop in butter, eggs and milk means a corresponding fall in the price of flesh foods. Prime beef and mutton are now from six to eight cents cheaper than a twelvemonth ago, and pork is also coming down. The hay, grain and tuber crops have been so plentiful and therefore sell so cheap that many farmers prefer to feed them to their livestock; hence the supply of animals has much increased, and the great packing houses are full. Prime ribroast, sirloin and roundsteak are now retailing at from twelve to sixteen cents a pound, lamb at the same, and good mutton is as low as ten cents. There has been corresponding decrease in canned goods, grains and cereals. In fact, as far as food is concerned the poor man may be said to be on a level with the millionaire.

A Word About Our Guarantee

THOSE of our readers who are accustomed to following these talks on advertising will notice a slight difference in our Guarantee this week. In spite of the fact that we have repeatedly stated that we do not guarantee financial advertisements, we receive many letters asking us if we will reimburse our subscribers for any loss they may receive through having patronized financial advertisers. And so hereafter we will add a clause to our Guarantee covering this point.

As we have so frequently stated, it is impossible to guarantee a financial advertisement, for the reason that it would incur a mountain of liabilities which no reputable house could afford to shoulder. Some of the bond issues which are offered through advertisements involve millions of dollars, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD could not afford to hold itself liable for such an amount of money. Yet that is what it would be doing in effect if it guaranteed its financial advertisements. However, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD examines so closely into the integrity of its financial advertisers that the chance of loss to our subscribers is reduced to a minimum. Our Guarantee is as follows:

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement. This guarantee does not apply to financial advertisements.

Sir Luke White, M.P.
writes:
"My experience of Sanatogen confirms the medical opinion; there is no longer that feeling of fatigue which one previously experienced, but there follows from its use a distinct restorative effect."

Mr. Marshall Hall, K.C.
writes:
"I think it only right to say that I have tried Sanatogen, and I believe it to be a most excellent food."

Mr. Albert Stanley, M.P.
writes:
"I have derived great benefit from Sanatogen, which I found to be very highly nourishing. Several members of my family have also used Sanatogen, and, I am pleased to say, with undeniable results. I can most sincerely recommend it to others who may be suffering from exhaustion or nervousness."

Mr. G. H. Roberts, M.P.

How Statesmen of Two Great Nations Solve the Problem of "Nerves"

IN no field of human endeavor is there a greater demand upon nervous energy, in no profession does success depend more upon perfect nerve health than in that of the parliamentarian. Think of the enormous responsibility of his work, of the constant strain imposed by legislative debate and committee service, of the added sapping of vitality by the late hours of semi-official social functions! Surely, if anywhere a tonic remedy finds its supreme field of usefulness it is among a nation's representatives. But it must prove its worth—"make good"—for they that rule at the Capitol and at St. Stephen's are men of sober judgment, careful in analyzing results, still more careful in expressing an opinion.

The letters reproduced on this page, therefore, have special significance, for what these men say of their experience with Sanatogen expresses the opinions of scores of other members of both Congress and Parliament, who have found Sanatogen a wonderful source of strength and vitality. It emphasizes the experience of hundreds of famous men and women who rely upon Sanatogen to rally the scattered forces of the nervous system. Most important of all, it is in harmony with the observations of thousands upon thousands of practising physicians, many of them leaders in medical science, who have noted in numberless instances the health-giving, nerve-strengthening effects of Sanatogen.

You who are nervous, run-down, anemic or below par, should grasp the helping hand of Sanatogen. It will infuse new vigor into the starved nerves, regenerate digestion and assimilation, help you to overcome that wretched condition of weariness, that run-down feeling of depression. And all the time you have the satisfaction of knowing that you are taking a preparation approved by the best medical authorities, a remedy compounded on strict scientific principles of pure albumen combined with glycerophosphate of sodium, which can do only good—never the slightest harm—a food and a tonic, but not a mere stimulant.

Bed-Time at Mont-Lawn

Memorial to Louis Klopsch

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

I HAVE always held that the best way to remember a friend who has gone from this world to the next, the best way to keep his memory green, and to perpetuate his name, is to continue the work he loved. A costly mausoleum may be erected in a cemetery, but it merely dominates the humbler gravestones on which are recorded in brief inscription the names of the sleepers under the sod. I believe in the life everlasting. I believe that when we slip out of this life here, as Louis Klopsch did on March seventh, Nineteen-ten, we simply drop the fetters and handicaps of earth and go on living, loving and serving in the perfect life of heaven.

Having said this, I may say with conviction that no memorial to Louis Klopsch could be so fitting as one which would carry on, in the time to come, the work that was and is dearest to his heart. I do not think of this good friend of us all as dead. The word is ill suited to Dr. Klopsch. He is living and loving still, and, somewhere in God's universe, is full of the energy, enthusiasm and ardor in doing God's will and work which were his characteristics. Few men have ever expended their store of strength so lavishly as Dr. Klopsch in the service of humanity. To him this service meant in its largest significance the service of Christ. All men were his brothers. They might be poor, they might be regarded by others as derelicts, they might be considered beyond help, but he was ready to lend a hand to assist them, lift them out of the Slough of Despond and set them on firm ground. He had a genius for compassion, for hope and for giving immediate practical aid. He was an inspiration to the rest of us.

Louis Klopsch had the heart of a child. No one could know him intimately without constantly seeing the sweet, simple straightforwardness of the child in the man. He loved children, understood them, and delighted in doing what he could for their relief if they were in trouble.

One well-remembered day, by Dr. Klopsch's invitation, I went with him for a glimpse of Mont-Lawn. All the way from New York to Nyack, a pleasant little journey, he told me about his plans for its future. He was a man who saw visions and dreamed dreams. He was also a magnificent organizer. With him, to see was to plan, to achieve, and to accomplish. Mont-Lawn was steadily extended every year from the first to the last in which its founder watched its growth.

Standing at his own door, with a wave of the hand and a joyous word he welcomed the successive stageloads of children who were going on to the lovely summer home where they were to spend a happy fortnight. With the same cordial personal word he bade them good-by when they went away. They seemed to be coming and going all the time, the arrangements being so complete that there was no interval between the departure of one set of children and the arrival of another. The children were drawn from the ranks of the very poor. Unless you who read this know as I do by personal investigation the back alleys, rear tenements and crowded streets of the East Side of New York, you cannot have the faintest idea of how and where and on what the children of the very poor exist.

To sleep in one of the little white beds at Mont-Lawn between clean sheets, is a strange experience to a child who has slept in the room with father and mother and a half dozen sisters and brothers, with possibly a boarder thrown in. This room may very possibly have little outside air, the ventilation coming from the rooms on its either side. The mothers of the tenements do their best, but the mattresses on which the family sleep at night are often piled up on the floor by day, and the ceremony of setting a table and sitting down to meals is almost unknown. If the family are fortunate enough to have sufficient bread and meat to go round, the mother cuts off the portions as she stands by her table, and distributes them to her brood. Thousands of children in New York go breakfastless to school every day.

What it must be to the Mont-Lawn children, three times a day for two weeks in the summer time, to sit down and eat a full, well-cooked meal, with every dainty table appointment, to have all they want furnished as from an inexhaustible supply, is in itself a wonderful thing to remember. They go back to their homes with a new start toward health and with new ideas, which in many cases tend to make even the poor home a cleaner and better place.

Mont-Lawn is situated in one of the most beautiful reaches of the Hudson River Valley. Its surroundings and views are vividly picturesque, and everywhere in its neighborhood are the homes of refined, cultivated Christian people. Many of these homes are extremely beautiful. The landscape is one of gardens, fields and woods, with always the noble river flowing between its undulating banks to the great sea. The dwellers in this neighborhood have reason to take pride that Mont-Lawn was founded and is sustained in their midst. Its management has been without a flaw, and every one who is familiar with the children and their summer home speaks of it as in every way a model worth imitation.

The plan which has been clearly outlined in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the endowment of Mont-Lawn must and will be carried through. Without burdening any one, Mont-Lawn can be endowed so that it may become a permanent institution, in no danger from the fluctuations of the times. We can not let this work be ever so slightly imperiled. Our wish is to place it on a secure foundation, to make it from year to year the best memorial of a man who was peerless among his fellows in unselfishness, sincerity and breadth of vision. Dr. Klopsch loved the children; the children dearly loved him. Shall we not keep his memory green? Those who wish to help must say to themselves, "The time between now and the seventh of March is brief. Immediate action and prompt response to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S appeal will place the Endowment Fund where we wish to have it, on a firm and lasting basis."

One word more. When you look into the sweet faces around your home table, when you hear the shout of your boy and the laugh of your girl, and see them growing up amid the sweet influences of an ideal home, will you not as a thank offering for these dear ones try to do something for the welfare of other girls and boys for whom life is opening under auspices very different? What you may do to help the city children who have had almost no real childhood may come back to you in a shower of blessings as your children grow to maturity.

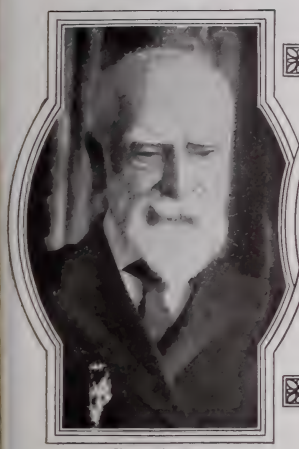
LET EVERY MEMBER OF THE FAMILY HELP

THE beautiful appreciation of Dr. Klopsch printed above was sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Mrs. Sangster, together with a note in which she said: "I am glad to be able to put on record my sentiment of admiration and appreciation for Dr. Klopsch. I am perfectly sure the Endowment Fund will be raised."

We can assure Mrs. Sangster that the fund will be raised because of the tremendous response which the call has evoked from our readers. Literally, thousands of letters have been received, a number of which you will find throughout this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Every one seems to approve the idea, and some very well known names have been signed to the letters.

One reader makes a suggestion which we think well worthy of adoption. After protesting against any mere monument of stone, she says: "Why not appoint a Memorial Committee of representative men and women? I am sure many would like to serve."

This is an excellent idea, which we submit for the approval of our readers. That the movement is growing rapidly is shown by the number of friends who have written in, pledging themselves to obtain as many subscribers as possible for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in order that half the subscription money so received will be devoted to Mont-Lawn. This is in response to the offer of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to devote one-half of all money received from all new yearly subscriptions mailed on or before March 7, the anniversary of the death of Dr. Klopsch. Here is a way in which even the humblest may bring about the assurance of the memorial fund, for it is within the power of any one to induce at least one friend to help along the memorial by subscribing to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Just think what it would mean if every family in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is read, would make up its mind to secure at least one new subscriber. Not only would the influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD be greatly strengthened so that the great work inaugurated by Dr. Klopsch can be continued, but the memorial to his name would be assured, and Mont-Lawn would become a perpetual benevolence to the children of the New York slums.



And so, dear friends, we would ask you to lend your aid to this laudable movement by bringing it to the notice of all your friends who might become interested. Induce just one of those friends to forward a subscription, and you may rest satisfied that the memorial to Dr. Klopsch will become a fact. Induce ten of your friends to send in yearly subscriptions and you will be classed as a Patron of the Memorial, and your name will be inscribed upon a tablet, which will be placed upon the walls of the Children's Temple, where Dr. Klopsch and his little friends passed so many happy hours.

PEOPLE'S DAY AT THE WHITE HOUSE

By REV. WILLIAM WILKINSON

GEOGRAPHY, chronology, and biography are the eyes of history. Without a knowledge of these, it is not possible to write of the past, present or probable future of a nation. Washington overlooks the great natural amphitheatre, the centre of which is the Potomac. From the higher parts of the District of Columbia views open that are fit to vie with those of any capital city on the continent.

One of the very great days of the Republic was October 13, A.D. 1792. In those days, the great men who were at the height of the nation's official home, had no prejudice against the number thirteen, for it was the day when George Washington laid the foundations of the White House, amidst rejoicing and gladness. The man who drew the plans was famous in his day. His name was James Hoban. The White House, which was modeled after a handsome building near Dublin, Ireland, is to this day a stately commodious building. Its unbroken front, its massive Ionic columns and spacious grounds, give charm to it. It took a year to complete. When it was ready to be inspected, President Washington, with his wife, went through it, and they were proud of it.

John Adams went in 1800 to live in the White House. The people of the Republic did not then number more than 5,000,000 souls. Fourteen years later, the British troops set the White House on fire, and only the walls remained; but it was soon rebuilt and was once more the pride of our people.

The Republic grew at a pace which no man, in 1814, would have thought possible. In structure, the White House stood very nearly as at first designed. But a White House that answers all the purposes of the President of 5,000,000 people, will not answer all the purposes of the chosen chieftain of 90,000,000.

So it was wisely ordered in 1902 and 1903 to enlarge the White House. The need and the great value of the enlargement are never seen to such advantage as on a people's day at the "mansion" of the chief executive. Now, all is order; there is no need of crowding; all can find room, pleasure, satisfaction. Notice having been given of a public reception by the President, all things are prepared. Additional officers are placed in, around, and near the White House. There are, every day in the year, eighteen police guarding the place. These are divided into three platoons, each of whom works eight hours. There is an extra man, so that if need should arise, the number is not lessened. There are three watchmen at all times inside. In the night, each has to press a knob which registers the fact that the officer is on duty and not asleep. The police at the White House are intelligent, observant, alert, and upright to men who have business at the White House. They are able to answer questions in an obliging and direct way. The chief care-taker, if that is his true description, has been in service twenty years, and is far from being spoiled by his important station. He is not obsequious, but meets one with a pleasant smile, and helps one's plans.

The White House being set in order for a public reception, all arrangements are made so as to give pleasure by convenience. On a gala day the wife of each Cabinet officer stands with the President and Vice-President and their wives to receive. At 11 A.M., four buglers blow a flourish. As the sound dies away "The Star-Spangled Banner" is started by the Marine Band and rouses all who hear it to enthusiasm. Next "Hail to the Chief" makes hearts beat quickly. The President wears a four-button frock coat and a plain tie (just such a tie as I saw King Edward, at the garden

NOT FAR FROM THE KINGDOM

TEXT—Mark 12:24

IT IS said that in one of the great cathedrals across the sea there is a clock, which is so marvelous in its mechanism that ignorant and superstitious people have almost looked upon it as not the work of man but of God. It is said that when the chimes ring out it would seem almost as if a company of angels had lodged in the cathedral spire to sing heaven's sweetest music. For a long time the maker of the clock was not paid for his services, so one day he stole up in the cathedral spire and touched one of the springs of the clock, and although all the mechanism was there the wheels did not move; although the chimes were there, they did not ring out. Then it is said that weeks and months afterwards the maker was paid for his services, and he came again and touched the same spring, and suddenly the same sweet music rang out, and there was the same wonderful exhibition of mechanism. It is an interesting story, and to my mind it is a good illustration of many in the world to-day who seem to lack but one thing to make them all that God would have them be, and that is the touch of the Master's hand. It would be a sad thing to see an arch without a keystone, a building without a foundation, a human heart without a hope; and to find a man attempting to battle with and defeat all the temptations of life in his own strength. It would seem to me that the story we are studying is in line with the story of the cathedral clock. "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God."

Near to the Kingdom

I need scarcely remind you that these were the last days of Jesus on earth. The shadow of the cross was already falling upon him. His enemies somehow seemed to realize that he was about to leave them, although doubtless they would never have put it in words, and they were attempting in every way to entrap him in his doctrine. The Sadducees, who had no hope of the resurrection, put their questions to him, while a man who was evidently fair in his judgment, and a lawyer of the old days, stood off and listened. And when he saw that Jesus answered them fairly, he turned to him with his own questions. He said: "Master, which is the first commandment?" And I would like those of you who say that all we need is just to do the best we can in this life for ourselves and our fellow-men about us, to listen to the reply of Jesus. He said: "This is the first commandment: 'The Lord our God is one Lord.'" Then he went on to say that man owed allegiance to him. "And this," said he, "is the second commandment: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

Then he brought out clearly our duties and our obligations to our fellow-men. So if you are going to take Jesus as a model of fairness, and as a great teacher, before you begin to serve your fellow-men you must begin to know God. Before you begin to help those who are round about you, and succeed in helping them, you must get your inspiration from him. The first commandment is: "The Lord our God is one Lord." And you owe a duty to him. And when Jesus saw that this man answered him fairly and honestly, he turned to him saying: "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God."

Stepping Across the Line

But I call your attention to the fact that Jesus did not say he was in the kingdom of God. It is a possible thing to be near, and yet be out. It is a possible thing to be almost saved, and yet be far from the kingdom. It is a possible thing to almost hear the music of heaven, and yet never know Jesus Christ as your personal Saviour. And so my message has to do with those of you who because of this influence, or because of that, have been coming slowly and yet surely to the border line. "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God." So many influences lead one to this position! But whatever the force may be—whether it is the influence of the home, or of preaching, whether it is the influence of the best friend you ever had in this world—I want to make it as plain as I can to you that there comes a time when, in addition to the mother's prayers, and the minister's pleading, you must act for yourself. You must will to enter the kingdom. You must say: "I choose Jesus Christ to be my personal Saviour."

When Mr. Moody was preaching in a great series of meetings held just outside of the city of Boston, a young man heard him night after night. He felt that he ought to be a Christian, and he came to the place where again and again his hand was lifted for prayer; and again and again he passed into the inquiry service; but he said, "To-morrow night I will settle it," and leaving the building, he passed away from the service. Walking out to his home at the edge of the city, he passed underneath a row of trees on the way to his house. Suddenly he stopped. The moonlight was shining way through the trees. He took his walking-stick and drew a line across the pathway. Then he stepped back and looked at it. "Now," said he, "if I step over that line it means that I will surrender. If I go around that line it means that my determination is against Jesus Christ." He stood looking at the line only for a moment, and then deliberately passed over it. And it is a bit of history that the man who that night found himself near to the kingdom of God, and by an act of his will simply stepped over the line, became one of our most earnest Christians, and one of the most faithful workers for Christ. So, whatever the influence may be that has brought you near to Christ, you never will become a Christian until you act for yourself, and say, "I will." "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God." But to be near is still to be lost.

Allow me to suggest two or three things that may have brought us near to the kingdom. First, natural temperament. While it is true that morality, which is the result of personal effort, cannot save, at the same time I wish to pay a tribute to morality; it is not to be despised. But on the authority of God's Word I dare to say: There is not found in all the New Testament one single verse of Scripture which, if you take in its connection, teaches any other thing than this: That man is not saved by his own righteousness; that man is not saved by his own morality, or his own good graces. But man is saved because he puts his trust in Jesus Christ, accepting him as his Saviour, letting him become the power and strength of his life, letting him become the incentive to all goodness and greatness. Natural temperament may bring you very near. But if you are boasting of a morality, let me ask you this question: Whose is the standard of morality? Possibly you may fail before my standard. If I were attempting to be saved in my own strength, I might fail before yours.

Only One Standard

There is only one standard of righteousness, and that is God's standard, and no man can ever know God, nor enter into the kingdom of God, until he reaches that standard. It is an absolutely hopeless task in your own strength. A man might as well try to lift himself by his own boot straps as in his own strength to rise up to the standard of righteousness of an infinite God. But when by faith you accept Jesus Christ; when you turn away from sin, and unto him; when you say, "From this day on I shall walk with him"; when your life is yielded to him, so that he lives in you, and works through you—then God looks at you no longer as an individual, but he looks at you in Christ.

So near, so very near to God,
Nearer I could not be;
For in the person of his Son,
I am as near as he.

Natural temperament will never save you, but faith in Christ will save you.

I have an idea that very many people are brought near to the kingdom by home influence. If there were no other influence in this world that would have brought me near to Christ, it would have been the influence of my father. I saw him live an absolutely consistent life; I saw him meet reverses without complaint; I saw him bury my mother with an unfailing faith in Jesus Christ; I saw him, after having been a man of comparative wealth, come down to the place where he faced poverty, and yet with his little children about him he never forgot to praise God for his goodness to him. When he died he left me one inheritance. It was not an inheritance of money, it was not an inheritance of position. It was a New Testament, which was wrapped in a piece of paper and given to me as my part of the estate. And when I turned over the pages of this New Testament I saw verses which he had marked with his pen; I saw places on the margin where he had written his appreciation of God's promises. I saw page after page that seemed stained with his tears. Then I saw at the close of the Book his written consecration to Jesus. And if there had been no other influence in all my life, that would have brought me near to the kingdom. There are many men with fathers as great and good as mine, and they have brought you near to the kingdom, but they will not save you. "I would go on my hands and knees through the streets of this city, if I could reach my boy," said a man to me. He raised up his hand. "I would cut off my right hand if I could reach him," he said. Then he sat down on the couch by my side, dropped his face in his hands, and sobbed as if his heart would break as he said, "I would die if I could reach him."

Influence of Godly Parents

There are many fathers who would die for their boys if they could, but the boy himself must choose. "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God." And you never will be saved until you say for yourself, "I will." When we were in the city of Philadelphia a boy was arrested in the upper part of the city, and carried into the police station. His mother, who never knew that he was living other than a good life, came down to the prison to see him. She brought the cover from the bed in his room, thinking that he must be cold. She thought he might be hungry, and brought a little basket of delicacies, as a mother's fingers only could prepare. When they opened the iron door of the prison to let her pass through, and when she got into his cell, she gave him the clothing to keep him warm, put the food down at his feet, and burst into tears. They took her home, and she cried all the night through, and when the morning came they found her dead upon her knees. The doctor said she had died of a broken heart. And there are many of us who have been brought nearer, and nearer, and still nearer, not by the preacher, not by the singer, but by the best memory that ever held a man's mind, the sweetest memory that ever stirred his emotions—the memory of his mother. In my mail the other day came these few lines: "I love old mothers. Mothers with white hair and kindly eyes, and lips grown softly sweet with murmuring blessings for their friends. There is something in their quiet manner that speaks of the calm of Sabbath afternoons. Old mothers, as they pass with slow, timid step. Sweet mothers, as they pass, one sees again old garden walks, old roses, and old leaves." And when I read those lines I was back again with my mother. I could feel the touch of her hand, and see the tears upon her cheeks. There is many a man who has had the same experience, and you are brought near by your mother. But all the mothers in the world could not save you. You may be near to the kingdom, but you must act for yourself.

Practical Preaching

I want to suggest another thing that I believe has brought some of you near, and that is preaching. The highest compliment that has been paid me as a preacher was paid by a man who said: "I have attended these mission services from the first. I have heard the singing, and I have heard every sermon you have preached, and not one single night have I been able to sit down. I have always stood in the crowd. But there was only one person present, and that was myself. You were preaching to me. When you preached to me I was back in England, I was sailing to South Africa, I was landing on these Australian shores, and I was breaking my mother's heart, and I was hurting myself. Sir," he said, "there has been only one man in all the crowd you have preached to, and I was the man." It has been practical preaching you may have heard and you have understood it. I have an idea that if you should stand at the Judgment and God should say to you: "Did you understand me? Did you understand my eternity?" You would say, "No." Who could understand the infinite God, who holds the winds in his fist, and in the hollow of whose hands the seas wash? Who could understand the majesty of God? And if God should say, "Did you understand me?" I think you would say, "O God, I did not." And if you made such a confession I think he might say, "My ways are not your ways, and my thoughts are not like yours."

But if when you stand at the Judgment, God should say to you, "Did you understand that sin was an awful thing?" you would have to say, "Yes." "Did you understand that Jesus Christ presented the only way to be saved from sin?" you would have to say, "Yes." You have understood the preaching. And the warning has come to you in time. Your heads are clear, and your eyes are wide open. An officer of my church out in the Middle Western part of America was riding a young horse one day, and the horse threw him. In falling one foot caught in the stirrup, and he could not release it, and the horse dragged him for at least a mile. Then the leather strap of the stirrup broke, and later a gentleman driving along the highway saw this old man lying on the road almost dead. They sent for his minister, and when I went in to see him, he was only half conscious. Later, when he had passed out of danger, I bent over him and said, "Tell me this: If you had not been a Christian, could you have decided for Christ in these days?" He said, "Never. The pain of my body was too intense, and the ache of my head was too severe." But the warning has come to you in time. "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God."

I have one other thing to suggest as bringing you to this position, although I could speak of many. You stand in the place you occupy this evening because of prayer. Somebody has been praying for you. When you left England's shores, your old mother followed you down to the dock, put her arms around your neck, and said, "My boy, every day I will pray for you." And every letter that has come across the seas had that in it—prayer. It was prayer. One of the most terrific storms that ever happened on the northern sea was raging. The fisher folk had gathered upon the shore, and were down upon their knees in prayer, the minister in the centre of them. The vessel was plunging down into the trough of the waves, and then mounting on the crest of them. The master of the vessel put his speaking trumpet to his lips, and shouted, "Boys, if we go down again it is the end. Make ready." And they went down again, and once more they came up. Then the master put the speaking trumpet to his lips again, and shouted, "Lads, there is some one praying for us on the shore to-night. We shall weather the storm." It is your minister. It is your old mother, who has brought you near to the kingdom. But I need not speak of all the other influences. You are near the kingdom. You are near the kingdom. God is here, and you are near the kingdom.

When Mr. Moody was conducting a meeting in England, night after night a man came into the audience. He was a Cornish miner. One night as Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey were leaving the platform, they noticed him sitting under the gallery with a friend. Mr. Moody made his way over to him, and the miner said to him, "Sir, I said to my companion, I will never leave this building until I am saved." Mr. Moody that night led him to Christ. The next day there was an explosion in one of the mines, and many men were taken out, bruised, and bleeding, and dying. This man was among the wounded, and when they bent down he was fast passing away. When they took water to wash away the dirt from his face, he opened his eyes. His friend of the previous night was kneeling at his side, and the Cornish miner, who was saved the night before, was saying this: "Jem, it is a good thing I settled it last night." And he was gone. Oh, it would be a great thing for you to settle it now, while yet there is hope. The door of mercy is open. I bid you enter in.

Five Porches and One Pool

By Rev. J. M. FARRAR, D.D.*

HAVE you read this beautiful story? It is about a wonderful pool near the sheep market in Jerusalem. By the side of the pool were five porches. On the porches were great crowds of sick people. Why were they there? Why do crowds go to Hot Springs, and many other places where there are springs and pools? The crowds on the five porches were sick and hoped the waters would heal them. At certain times an angel came down and troubled the water of the pool. The word "troubled" means that the angel made the water move, started little waves across the pool. When the water was rippling in the sunshine, then was the time for the sick to step in. The one who stepped in first after the pool was agitated would be healed. Each one tried to get in first. Some had strong friends there ready to drop them in.

There was one man there who had been sick for thirty-eight years. He was on the lower porch ready to step in, but some one was sure to get in first. He had no big, strong friend to help him. Christ was sorry for this man, and just took him in and healed him in the pool of his love. When the pool of Christ's love has little waves of sympathy running over it some one is sure to be healed. In every Christian heart is a pool of love, and there are many porches by its side. The porch of kindness, the porch of friendship, the porch of hospitality, the porch of helpfulness, and the porch called Golden Rule. When a good angel makes the pool move with waves of sympathy, then it heals. But there are bad angels. When they stir the pool of love it becomes muddy and does not heal. While we are thinking about our pool and porches, we will listen to a story found in an evening paper from the city of Brotherly Love.

ANNA and Elizabeth were two little sisters who lived near the seashore. Every day they would go down and play on the beach, watch the waves, and climb over the rocks by the edge of the sea. Between two of these big stones they one day found a lovely little pool.

It was different from any they had ever seen, for it seemed to go way down deep, yet was so clear they could see lovely shells and seaweed at the bottom, while glittering little fish swam around.

All day they played about the lovely pool, and next morning Anna was up early to go down and take another look at its wonders.

Elizabeth begged her to wait till she could go, too, as she had an errand to do for her mother; but Anna wouldn't wait, and even when Elizabeth cried, she declared she didn't care, and ran off as fast as she could to the rocks where the pool lay.

WHEN she got there, however, to her surprise and dismay she found that the pool was all muddy, and the porches had fallen down. Little waves of anger rolled and churned across the muddy pool and frightened her.

"Oh, dear! oh dear!" she sobbed; "where is our lovely, lovely pool?"

"You have made it muddy yourself," said a voice behind her; and looking around quickly, Anna saw a little old man with a coat all made of seaweed and a shell for a hat, standing back of her.

"Who are you?" she cried, and the little old man laughed.

"I'm one of the sea fairies," he said. "We have watched you little girls for a long, long time, and we made this pool for you the other night when the moon was at the full, and all the fairies came and put shells and seaweed and fishes in just for you. Then we made a magic path from your door so that your feet brought you here to see our labors. But now—now that you have been cross to your little sister, the anger in your heart has spoiled our lovely pool and broken down the porches."

"Oh, I'm so sorry!" cried Anna. "But I am still more sorry that I was cross and horrid to Elizabeth."

"Then go tell her so," said the little old man, "and bring her back here."

SO ANNA ran back and put her arms around Elizabeth and begged her forgiveness, and hand in hand they ran back to the pool.

To their delight it was clear and beautiful again, and the little old man was sitting on one of the porches singing.

"Welcome, welcome, little girls," he cried. "The pool is clear again and will stay so as long as your hearts are full of happiness and kindness. But every cross word or action will make it muddy, and if you stay cross, the pool will vanish altogether."

Then he called, and a lot of little fairies dressed in green came from behind the five porches singing:

We are the fairies of the sea,
We play on the top of the foam;
And east and west, without wanting rest,
We merrily, merrily roam.

The shells of the sea are the gems we wear,
The seaweed makes up each dress;
And the fish we ride in the ebbing tide,
As we speed from the east to the west.

Hortense and I

THAT rope of pearls around her swan-like throat
Doth well set off Hortense's queenly charms:
I have a necklace of more value far—
My baby's arms.

Hortense in stately coach hath just passed by;
To hear a famous diva she doth go:
I list to sweeter music here at home—
My baby's crow.

Admiring glances are Hortense's due,
And flattery doth follow her the while,
And words of adoration—I have but
My baby's smile.

Hortense's mirror doth reflect a queen;
I have a mirror of far smaller size,
But one in which my plain face seemeth fair—
My baby's eyes.

Novelist Phillips Shot

DAVID GRAHAM PHILLIPS, well-known throughout the country as a magazine writer and the author of several works of popular fiction, was fatally shot in a New York street on the afternoon of January 23, and died the following day. He had just emerged from his rooms in the old Gramercy Park section of the city and was on his way to the Princeton Club in the same neighborhood, when he was attacked. His assailant, Fitzhugh Coyle Goldsborough, in rapid succession shot six bullets into the body of his victim, then turned the weapon on himself and fired the last bullet into his own brain, causing instant death. Phillips was hurried to the hospital, but despite the efforts of the best surgical science, he succumbed to his wounds the second night after the assault. The double tragedy caused a sensation in the city. It is believed that Goldsborough was obsessed with the delusion that Phillips had lampooned him and his family and held them up to public ridicule in one of his recent novels. He had been dogging the writer for months, but the latter was unconscious of that fact, and though he had received some threatening letters, took no precaution to safeguard himself, never entertaining the idea that an attack would be made upon his life. Goldsborough read almost everything Phillips wrote and was supposed to be an admirer of the novelist. While not a literary man himself, he had read much, and had received a good education. He pursued a musical course in Europe, for several years, studying under well-known professors in Munich, Leipsic, Berlin and Vienna. Previous to the tragedy he had been eking out a precarious living by giving music lessons. He was born in Maryland in 1880. His father is a physician in Washington. The murdered man was one of the most successful of the modern school of fiction and magazine writers. He was born in Indiana in 1867 and was graduated from Princeton University in 1887. He adopted literature as a profession, starting out as a newspaper reporter. The experience gained in this line formed the foundation on which he built his later works of fiction. Her Serene Highness, The Fortune Hunter, and The Second Generation are the best known of his books. He was a bachelor, keeping rooms in the home of a married sister.

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I hope the memorial will take the form of an endowment for Mont-Lawn. I believe nothing could be done that would have pleased the late Dr. Klopsch more. MRS. B. T. SHAVER.

How the Canal Will Be Fortified

NOW that the end of the great work of dividing the continents is in sight—in his report of his recent visit to Panama President Taft placed the date for its completion at December 30, 1913, eleven months earlier than that promised by the Chief Engineer—the question of protecting the waterway by fortifications is becoming one of more and more absorbing interest.

Twenty-one million dollars is the sum that will be asked of Congress for Canal construction this year; fifty per cent. more than last year. Of this sum, $12,000 is asked for construction of fortifications for Canal defense. As itemized, this includes: site emplacement, guns, carriages, ammunition, power plants, searchlights and fire control; field fortifications and camps, and the construction of posts for a permanent garrison for the defense of the Isthmian Canal.

The provisions for fortification are made a part of the appropriation for Canal construction, because it is the desire of the administration to identify the two projects, and also because the construction of the forts will be under the direction of the Isthmian Canal Commission. In recommending the fortification of the Canal last April, the joint Army and Navy Board said: "As it will require years to construct, complete and emplace the proposed armament, if it is to be done in an orderly and economical manner, it will be necessary to commence the construction within the present current calendar year in order to insure the completion by the date of the completion of the Canal."

There is an international aspect of the situation which rests with a treaty made between the United States and Great Britain in 1850, which is known as the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty. The agreement deals with the neutrality of an inter-oceanic Canal and sets forth a "general principle of neutralization." In part this document runs: "The governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over said ship Canal, agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortification commanding the same."

This treaty is superseded by the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty of 1901, yet the "general principle of neutralization" is carried from one to the other, and the terms of the latter refer directly back to this special clause in the former as in the following Article 6:

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the countries traversed by the aforementioned Canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty [Hay-Pauncefote]."

It will be seen that Great Britain is the only nation that has any legal right to express an opinion for or against the fortification of the Canal. This fact is made a point of argument by those who favor the fortification; i. e., the maintenance of the "general principle of neutralization." It is necessary to have such defense, first, because the Canal must be so fortified that it can never be used against the United States; second, the purpose of the treaty which superseded the treaty of 1850 was to allow the United States to fortify the Canal, and the subsequent act of Congress authorizing the proper defense of the Canal was passed in accordance with this understanding; third, because the United States has contracted with Great Britain to preserve the neutrality of the Canal, it is therefore the duty of the United States, in accordance with its promise with the United Kingdom, to maintain the neutrality of the Canal. This may be done in two ways: (a) By an international agreement, subject to abrogation at any time, though it is doubtful if it would withstand the exigencies of war. (b) By making the Canal impregnable by fortifications and armaments.

The Engineering Corps on the Canal Fortifications

One of the strong arguments used by those opposed to fortification is that the Suez Canal is held neutral by an agreement among the powers of Europe, and that the neutrality has been respected during wars in which European powers have been engaged as belligerents. Again, the opposition declares that the spirit of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, which expressly forbade fortification, is apparently reiterated in the later treaty. One expert opinion of the opposition has been expressed by the suggestion that the Canal could not be so protected as to guarantee a safe passage through it for naval vessels in time of war. Representative J. Warren Kiefer, of Ohio, who has visited the Isthmus a number of times during the last few years, asserted in a speech made in the House of Representatives that "no force that the United States could send to Panama could adequately protect the Canal, and that it would be a source of weakness in time of war if its neutrality must be maintained by the United States alone, and that an international agreement to maintain its neutrality would be as effective in this case as it is in the case of the Suez Canal."

Meantime, the sites on the Isthmus are selected, preliminary plans are prepared and men are already there who, under the direction of army engineers skilled in that particular sort of construction, are prepared to begin the work. There are several small islands at the Pacific entrance, and the plan is to fortify at least one of these islands. The locks in the Pacific side are seven miles inland from these islands and protected by hills. The Atlantic entrance is protected by batteries mounted on a low peninsula which extends into the Caribbean Sea and forms one shore of Limon Bay. The locks at Gatun are seven miles inland from this point. The length of the Canal is fifty miles and the country through which it runs is wild and hilly. The parts that are especially vulnerable to attack are the locks; but they are also parts that would make it impossible for a hostile fleet to pass through, provided it succeeded in passing the batteries at either entrance, as those in charge could easily fix the gates so that they would not be usable. J. M. B.

At the dinner of the Pennsylvania Society in New York recently, President Taft in an address on the Panama Canal said he yielded to no man in his love of peace. He could find nothing in the treaties made by the United States with other nations that prevented this country from fortifying the Panama Canal if it wanted to do so. He asserted further that if the Canal were not fortified, but protected from an enemy by a part of the navy, it would become a burden to the country, instead of a means of defense against invasion. Our naval force, in case of attack, would be weakened to whatever extent it would be called upon to defend the entrances to the Canal, and the Canal ought to defend itself. He continued:

"We built the Canal to help us defend the country, not to help an enemy to attack it. Even if a certain and practical neutralization of the Canal by agreement of all nations could be secured to us, when engaged in war an enemy could then use the Canal for transit to attack us in both oceans, as we purpose to use it to defend ourselves. After expending $500,000,000 thus to make our national defense easier are we to surrender half the military value of the Canal by giving the benefit of it to a nation seeking to destroy us? It seems to me that the very statement of the proposition carries its refutation.

"The estimated cost of the fortifications for the Canal is $12,000,000. That, I submit, constitutes hardly more than two per cent. of the cost of the Canal—a first premium for insuring its safety that is not excessive."

His mind was a storehouse of universal knowledge, encyclopedic in its vastness. He read and spoke all the European tongues and closely studied the politics of other countries, so that he came to be looked upon as the final authority on all points of international statesmanship. His great learning and exact knowledge gave him attention as a speaker, but he was too logically analytical and cold to arouse enthusiasm or make a great impression on audiences.

EDITOR, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I have received The Life Work of Louis Klopsch. It is a grand book. He certainly did a great work, and set a good example for all Christian people to follow. I do think that the Children's Paradise would be the best monument to Dr. Klopsch and the only one he would want if he had a choice. We certainly want to put a few dollars in the Children's Home if the people conclude to endow Mont-Lawn.

With my best wishes, MRS. SAMUEL SHARP.

The "Child Welfare" Exposition

Winthrop L. Rogers

Representing City Government—Mayor and Board of Aldermen

Charles F. Powlison

THE motto which Dr. Louis Klopsch caused to be inscribed on the Children's Temple at Mont-Lawn—"I Love God and Little Children"—might well have been selected as the motto of the Child Welfare Committee just closing a three weeks' exhibit in New York City. This exhibit was arranged with a purpose to show the work of the various good agencies that are striving for the child's welfare, as well as to throw light on phases of life detrimental to the child, with a view to stimulating the formation of some complete programme of action dealing with all the needs of the city child.

Naturally, such an exhibition has drawn to New York visitors from all sections of the country, to participate in its discussions and to benefit by its demonstrations. It originated with a few Christian men who had in mind at first simply a Sunday School exhibit. They were persuaded that it was their duty to show the people of New York certain sad facts and figures proving that there are a great number of children in the city entirely without religious instruction of any kind. Careful research convinced this committee, according to the statement of Mr. Edward R. Finch, a member, that there are at least one-half million children in New York City who receive no religious training! It was then proposed to arouse the city to the need of some plan for bringing these children within the compass of religious efforts and influences.

Little by little, the plan broadened and deepened, until it came to include on a comprehensive scale practically all the various agencies that affect the life of the city child for good or for evil. The exhibit has no creed or prejudice. One of the first pictured screens which meet the eye upon entering the building reads: "All Faiths agree that 'Righteousness Exalteth a Nation, but Sin is a Reproach to Any People.' To secure Civic Righteousness, the Home, the School, the Church must Work Together in the Training of the City's Children."

The exhibit was held in the Armory of the Seventy-first Regiment, N. G., N. Y. More than 50,000 square feet of floor and wall space were utilized to show photographs, tablets, models, mechanical devices and data having a direct bearing on the welfare of the child. As a whole, the exhibit has been a graphic summary of the result of years of investigation by more than three hundred of the leaders of thought and study in the several fields; while the open conferences of sociological experts, educators, municipal and church representatives have presented valuable lines for private and public action and for intelligent co-operation. A spirit of harmony marked the proceedings. Protestant, Catholic and Jew sat side by side on the lecture platform. As one speaker said, "This is the era of the child; we are studying the child in all humility; the children are leading us."

Two Little Waitresses

They learn how to set tables and serve various dishes

The conferences embraced topics concerning the health of the child, its home life, the price the State, as well as the child, pays for child labor, the temptations offered in street life and by cheap amusements, the possibility of offsetting the evils of "gangs" by organizing boys' clubs and societies, the education of the child and its religious life. All of these were illustrated by charts and diagrams, or by models or living demonstrations. The playground, the day nursery, the model tenement, the model toy, the library and museum, the school garden, all appeared in miniature.

The Church department showed a large number of beautiful pictures. Types of other work were also presented, showing how various churches have found it possible to attract and hold young people through all-round methods, including athletics, clubs, camps and classes for study or manual training.

Visitors found opportunity to see thousands of real children at play. A large central court on the main floor provided space for parades, gymnastics, drills, song and play festivals; giving pleasure to the audiences and demonstrating what can be accomplished for the benefit of the child through educational effort. One striking feature was a session of the municipal and judicial bodies of a Public School City, with mayor, commissioners, aldermen, judges and court officials in the persons of thirteen-year-old boys. Methods of the Children's Courts were also depicted.

Mr. Charles F. Powlison, the General Secretary, said to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD representative: "To me the Child Welfare Exhibit is a prayer—a prayer for the children of our great cities—a prayer that we may understand the child, sympathize with the child, protect the child, guide the child amid the artificial complexities of city life. The exhibit is an attempt to make plainer the processes of God in the wonderful laws of heredity and environment. The soul of the enterprise is nothing less than the divinity of fatherhood and motherhood crying out for justice—for health and happiness—for all children. It is our earnest hope that similar studies of conditions surrounding child-life shall be made in other cities, and that municipalities, as well as individuals and organizations, shall plan to make the cities of this land happy and habitable places for children."

A Spontaneous Movement

THE movement for a memorial to the late Dr. Louis Klopsch is rapidly assuming national proportions. It is now proposed to organize a representative Memorial Committee, which will probably be announced next week. Spontaneous letters of approval of the memorial endowment plan are reaching us in increasing numbers daily, showing the widespread, cordial interest it has awakened everywhere. All unite in declaring that Mont-Lawn should be the only monument of the man who wrote over its gates: "I love God and little children."

The Year's Growth in the Churches

DR. H. K. CARROLL, in charge of the Government Census of Churches, has prepared a comprehensive review of conditions in all denominations during 1910, which contains some very interesting and instructive figures. In the first place, it should be understood that his showing is official. Although the church gains were less in the aggregate than those of 1909, they were nevertheless substantial. The increase of ministers was 2,309, and of communicants 628,955. Of every 1,000 of our population, 385 are church communicants or members, and this includes children as well as adults. The Methodists gained 108,776, Disciples of Christ 89,759, Baptists 85,828, Lutherans 70,439, African M. E. Church 47,874, Presbyterians 72,659, Colored Baptists 34,589, Protestant Episcopal 16,677, Adventists 3,695, Congregationalists (estimated) 10,682, Reformed 5,621, Catholics 110,100. The German Evangelicals, Salvationists, United Brethren, Universalists and several other minor bodies are set down as showing a decrease. The total Christian Science strength is 85,096 instead of the 2,000,000 claimed by the adherents of that church. The Spiritualists, Theosophists and Ethical Culturists are at a standstill or declining. Unitarians are unreported. The largest Protestant financial budgets are those of the Methodists, $43,107,651 for 1910 and the Presbyterians $24,598,968. On the whole, the showing from the material side is healthy and promising.

King Ahab's Archives Found

IF THE reported discovery by Professor Reisner of Berlin of a hundred clay tablets, forming part of the official records of King Ahab's reign, be confirmed, we may reasonably look for important revelations which would throw light on some of the Biblical as well as secular history of that time. These tablets are said to have been found in Samaria, on the site of the Israelitish capital. Ahab ruled about B.C. 915-895, or 2,800 years ago. He was the contemporary of Jehoshaphat, the prophet Elijah, and Benhadad, King of Damascus. He was the weakest of all the Israelitish kings and his sinful alliances and many idolatrous relapses had a tragic culmination. Bible readers and students of ancient history will await with interest the deciphering of these records, which are written with black ink in old Hebrew characters, and should not be difficult to transcribe. They are the earliest Hebrew writings known to be in existence up to the present time, although further researches in Samaria may be productive of other valuable surprises.

The Warlike Hat-Pin

IT IS not often that our law-makers meddle with the fashions. These fashions may be grotesque, expensive, even shocking; yet legislatures generally give them only a laugh and a shrug, sure that soon they will pass on and be no more. But the enormous hat of the last few seasons has brought with it a serious social menace in the shape of the pins which secure it—so serious that in more than one State laws have been drawn up, or are in process of preparation, for the protection of the helpless public from their ravages. The other day a guard in the New York subway received on his face from one of these cruel pins a deep scratch, extending almost from his eye to his mouth. He will always carry the scar. In another case, a man snapped in two a foot-long hat-pin. In reply to the remonstrance of the indignant owner, he said, "It was either that, madam, or a bad wound on my face." Scores of such cases have been reported in the daily press, but the danger does not seem to abate. In most of the legal instruments which have been mentioned, the hat-pin is allowed to protrude from one to two inches, but even the latter affords a hazardous risk to the innocent passerby; while pins extending from three to six inches beyond the surface of the hats they confine, may be seen daily upon our streets. The good common sense and tender hearts of our women ought to combine to restrain them in this matter. Let them file off their long hat-pins or buy shorter ones. Our laws should not have to be invoked to institute a reform of this kind. Let the ladies step forward and accomplish it themselves.

Do You Know Your Bible?

IN April next, the tri-centenary of the grand old Bible of the English-speaking nations, the Authorized Version, will be fittingly celebrated throughout the world. No other book, sacred or secular, has been so widely circulated. There are many, however, who, though diligent readers of the Scriptures, yet know them imperfectly. This may arise from various causes. The Bible should be read reverently, prayerfully and with system, and not in a desultory fashion.

Of how many among us can it be said truthfully that we know our Bible? A simple test, which any one may apply, is suggested as a means of ascertaining what we really know of the Sacred Book. Even without the aid of helps, commentaries, or Bible dictionaries, the following list of questions, if they can be accurately answered, will give us the assurance that we have not studied the Word merely through the eye and the ear, but also with the understanding:

1. How many books are there in the Old Testament?
2. How many in the New?
3. What were the first words spoken to man?
4. Who offered the first prayer?
5. What Scripture passage implies that there was no rain before the flood?
6. Where is the giving of a tenth to God first mentioned?
7. Which of the tribes marched first across the wilderness?
8. What man literally broke all the commandments?
9. Where is the first account of female government recorded?
10. Who was the first raised from death?
11. Which is the first of the prophetical books?
12. In what book is the earliest prophecy of the millennium given?
13. What is the oldest city mentioned in early Bible times and still existent?
14. Whom did Joseph marry?
15. In the time of what good man did people first begin to pray?
16. What is the earliest mention of a temperance society?
17. Where do we find an account of the first missionary meeting?
18. Who made the first recorded confession to God?
19. What was the name of the wife of Moses?
20. Who made the ark of the covenant?
21. By whom was Solomon's Temple first destroyed?
22. What tribes of Israel were carried into captivity?
23. Who were the first and last of the Judges?
24. Who issued a decree that all the world should be taxed?
25. Who was appointed in the place of Judas, as one of the Twelve?
26. Who was the first Christian martyr?
27. Which book of the Bible ends with a curse and which ends with a blessing?
28. What prophet said: "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever"?
29. How many miracles did Christ perform?
30. How many appearances after the Ascension?
31. What is the Great Commission, and where is it to be found?
32. How many times did Christ close the Temple?
33. What test does John give by which we may know the children of God?
34. What test did Jesus give of discipleship?
35. Where are the conditions of salvation expressed in six words?

These questions can all be answered from the Bible itself. The majority of them will doubtless be familiar to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. In order to make a full and satisfactory test of one's Biblical knowledge, the list would have to be greatly increased; but the foregoing will suffice for the present. We will publish the answers in another issue, and meanwhile will be glad to hear from our friends who have any practical suggestions to make on this subject, with a view to stimulating Bible study, that all may become familiar with God's Holy Word.

A New Peace Prophet

A NEW peace prophet—Norman Angell—has arisen in England who is playing havoc with the traditions of the "jingoes." He does not stand on the corner and utter his denunciations of war to the ears of the chance passerby; he teaches conviction through the printing press. His book, dealing with the relation of military power to economic and social advantages, sounds like a clarion blast and is awakening the people to a right understanding of the folly and wickedness, as well as the unprofitableness, of wars of any kind, especially wars of conquest. "Even to the victor," declares this latter-day prophet, "war no longer pays." And he proceeds to the proof by adducing modern instances where war brought to the winning power financial and industrial burdens even heavier than those it imposed on the loser. The sum of his argument is that the citizen of either contesting country is always worse off, never better, whether his nation triumphs or suffers defeat; and that trade is not nowadays benefited by conquest. This kind of argument has its value, doubtless; but while the economic view is important, it is of far less consequence than the broad humanitarian aspect of the question. Every great military leader, while he may have extended his country's borders, drained it of its best bone and sinew and impoverished it physically and morally. Napoleon's wars used up the youth and strength of France; those of Charles XII. drained Sweden, not only of its gold and silver, but of its finest specimens of manhood, and left it with old men and women and children. Wars wear out the manhood and the morals, as well as the wealth of a nation. Now that they are becoming costlier than ever, the economic view appeals powerfully to the commercial mind, and is making it a valuable ally of the peace movement. Conviction through the pocket-book may not be so meritorious as that which comes through the heart and conscience, but it promises to be a great aid in the promotion of international arbitration.

I, with others, do not think there could be any more fitting, or appropriate, monument to the memory of our dear editor, Dr. Klopsch, than the Children's Paradise.

Aeroplanes in War

AMONG the remarkable demonstrations at the San Francisco meet recently, several indicated the value of the aeroplane to the armies and navies of the world. Mr. Eugene Ely flew from the grounds in San Francisco to the deck of the cruiser Pennsylvania and back again, which was considered a star event. Mr. Ely had no difficulty whatever in landing on the platform on the cruiser's deck. Captain Pond of the Pennsylvania said he thought that an aeroplane could land on the deck and depart from it without any platform or special preparation other than the clearing of the deck. Another star event was that of sending a wireless message from an aeroplane from one end of the aviation ground to the other end and its reception at the receiving station. Phillip Parmalee in a Wright machine had as a passenger Lieutenant Paul Beck of the United States Army, who manipulated the wireless sending apparatus. A group of army officers of the United States Signal Corps were present. The operating instrument which Lieutenant Beck employed weighed thirty-two pounds. When about 500 feet in the air he began to operate, sending out to the receiving station this message: "We are 500 feet high now and running level. It is getting chilly." The lighting upon and leaving the warship by Ely and the aerial wireless telegraphy by Beck are additional proofs that the aeroplane will be an efficient agency in war. While the nations of the earth are impoverishing themselves by the recruiting of armies and the construction of monstrous engines of war on land and on sea, the thought of the world led by the Church of Christ and our American millionaire philanthropist is toward a universal peace, and it is likely that there are children, maybe grown men, living today who will see the end of war and the fulfilment of the prophecy:

And they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks: nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. (Micah 4:3.)

Death and Immortality

Miss Violet D'Arcy, daughter of the late Captain D'Arcy of the British Navy, was killed at a subway station in New York City the other day. She and Mr. John K. Kewish, learning that Dr. Felix Adler of the Ethical Culture Society was to deliver a sermon on Immortality, started down on the subway to hear him. Impatient at the delay of the train, Miss D'Arcy leaned over the platform to see if there was a car in sight. Without warning a train came from the opposite direction and striking her threw her back dead in the arms of her escort. Miss D'Arcy was quite a psychologist and was deeply interested in the question of immortality. In the contemplation of that other life she was swiftly hurried into its realities. This is only one of the daily, hourly reminders of the uncertainty of this earthly life, and of the swift manner in which we may be called to leave it. Christ has imparted to us whatever certain knowledge we have of immortality, and has prepared the way for our entrance into and our enjoyment of its blessed realities.

Who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel. (II. Tim. 1:10.)

The Immigration Problem

The Immigration Commission, which was created three years ago, after most careful investigation recently reported to Congress its facts and conclusions and recommendations, which filled forty printed volumes. The Commission presents several propositions for the restriction of immigration, including a reading and writing test, the exclusion of unmarried and unskilled laborers, limitations in the number arriving at any one port and from particular races, as well as the amounts of money in their possession on arrival. The Commission was not unanimous in its recommendation of the reading and writing test. The Commission claims that the immigrants now coming do not furnish any more criminals or subjects for charity than the native born, but that the tendency toward industrial and city life remains unchanged in spite of the fact that statistics show the immigrants to have been more successful in agricultural pursuits. The report of the Commission urges national and State co-operation in the distribution of the immigrants, by which more of them can be sent to the agricultural districts. The report concurred in the agreement with Great Britain to exclude all British East Indian immigrants, the continuation of the present Chinese exclusion laws, and present regulations with regard to Japanese and Korean immigration, and asks the passage of the house bill for the deportation of alien criminals and making it applicable to alien seamen. The high character of the members composing the Commission, their painstaking work for three years and their sensible conclusions are worthy of commendation and should help materially in the solution of one of our most important and perplexing national problems. Most of our immigration has been our glory and success, some of it has been a burning disgrace. The nation has been slow enough to awake to the rejection of the undesirable and criminal applicants for citizenship on our shores. Love for men, loyalty to human government, fidelity to God in native born and immigrant are necessary to give us a continuation of our national character, prosperity and happiness.

Honor all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honor the king. (I. Peter 2:17.)

Gave to the Lord

Mrs. Emily H. Moir, widow of William Moir, a former cotton merchant, died in New York City recently and left her estate, which amounted to about $1,000,000, to the promotion of her Master's kingdom. She gave $50,000 in cash toward the endowment fund of the First Presbyterian Church of New York City, and $5,000 to its pastor, Dr. Howard Duffield. The Presbyterian Hospital received $20,000 in cash and one-fourth of the residue of the estate, which will be about $200,000 more. The relatives are comfortably cared for. To Jacob Van Allen, former coachman, is left $10,000. All the servants who have been in the family for one year are given $250 and the servants who have been in the family more than two years, are bequeathed $500. Harvard, Princeton and Lincoln Universities will receive $80,000 each, and Tuskegee College and Howard University, $40,000 each. Other bequests follow. Mrs. Moir had learned from her religion the art of giving and the joy as well. While living she had a heart and hand open to every cause of benevolence, and when she died she arranged that her personality should continue in the establishment of her Redeemer's kingdom. The happiness of her giving was one of her strongest means of grace.

For God loveth a cheerful giver. (II. Cor. 9:7.)

Sees with Glass Eye

One of the most remarkable surgical operations ever performed was that upon Dr. William Copley Winslow, noted archæologist, historical writer and minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The operation involved the placing of a glass lens in the eyeball, which enabled him to see almost as clearly as with the natural eye. Four years ago last October Dr. Winslow felt his eyesight failing. He was delivering a lecture from manuscript and his notes began to dance so that he could not distinguish them. Cataracts were found over both eyes and their removal did not restore his sight. Dr. Frederick Spalding of Boston, where Dr. Winslow lives, made an incision in the eye far above the lid. With great difficulty he put an antiseptic dressing in the wound and kept a bandage over his eyes for twenty-two days. When the wound had healed the surgeon inserted a glass lens, and through it the doctor sees well-nigh perfectly, and literally the blind has been restored to sight. The magical and merciful scientific discoveries of our Christian civilization are continuing to do by secondary causes what Christ did immediately.

What will ye that I shall do unto you? They say unto him, Lord, that our eyes may be opened. So Jesus had compassion on them, and touched their eyes; and immediately their eyes received sight. (Matt. 20:32, 34.)

Loved Mamma and Papa

At the suit for separation, brought by Mrs. William Wendling against her husband, head waiter in a Broadway restaurant, New York, the following pathetic letter written to her father by Julia, the fourteen-year-old daughter of the Wendlings, was given in evidence: "Now, papa, mamma can't work for us any longer. If you want us you can have us, but you got to go up to mamma and you have to tell her where you are going to put us, so that she can come up to see us. If you don't want to do that, you can send money to us, and then mamma will keep us. If you don't want to do either mamma will put us in an almshouse, or she will turn on the gas. Then we will be asleep for good and it will be your fault. We are so poor now, and mamma is sick in bed, and I have written this letter because I think it might do some good. Mamma does not know anything about this letter. If you write me a letter, kindly address it to your broken-hearted daughter." Julia and her sister Louise, who is two years younger, were summoned as witnesses. During the whole trial the girls wept so bitterly as to excite the sympathy of all in the court room. It was with great difficulty that Justice Whitney could quiet the cries of Julia so that she could give her testimony. The judge asked her whom she would like to live with, her father or her mother. She faltered and then said, "I love both of them dearly, and I want if I can to live with both of them. I hope they will come together again, for my sister and I want them. We are both very miserable now." Louise could not cease her sobbing long enough to testify, and Judge Whitney did not have her sworn. If there should be a tendency of conjugal affection to grow cold, it ought to be warmed by the love of such beautiful children, and by the responsibility to them which real fatherhood and motherhood imply. God's truth and Spirit are the magnet that binds the hearts of the home together in family love.

And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. . . . And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates. (Deut. 6:7, 9.)

Turkestan After the Earthquake

A Woman of Tashkend

Tea-Time in the Bazaars of Tashkend

A Turcoman

AS ALREADY briefly told in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, an earthquake, early in January, destroyed large sections of several important cities in Eastern Turkestan. The disaster, as now appears from information received from the East, was more extensive than first supposed. Vyernyi, a city of about twenty-three thousand inhabitants, which is the capital of the Russian Central Asian province of Semiryetchensk, received the full force of the shock. This city was founded by the Russians in 1854, on the site of the ancient town of Almaty, and, due to its location at the intersection of trade roads connecting already important cities, grew rapidly in population and business. It was a well laid-out city, having wide, shaded streets and detached houses, many of which were surrounded by fine fruit gardens and shaded by great poplars and elms. Practically the entire city was razed by the earthquake. Houses and bazaars were destroyed and great fissures were torn in the earth for miles around.

Przhevalsk and Pishpek, towns of about 8,000 people each, in the same province, are believed to have been totally wiped out. Communication with these distant points is very irregular at all times, and since the disturbance, the details that have come to hand are of the briefest sort. Newspaper dispatches, unvouched for by the Russian authorities, state that fully one-half of the inhabitants of Vyernyi were killed in the destruction of the city.

Earthquakes are not at all rare in this part of Turkestan. Since the establishment of the Russian government there in 1854, over three hundred shocks have been recorded. Vyernyi was practically destroyed only three years after it was founded, and was badly damaged again in 1897. In the valley of the Syr-Daria River there are twelve epicentres of seismic activity. The ancient city of Tashkend, though one hundred and eighty-five miles from the centre of the disturbance, was badly damaged by the recent shock. Tashkend is one of the most important cities of the Upper Syr-Daria Valley, as it was one of the centres of bygone Mohammedan learning and commerce, and has continued through revolutions and foreign wars to be a great trading city. Only a few years ago, 27,000 camels were employed in its caravan trade. Its inhabitants, its architecture and its customs all bear evidence of the conquests and migrations that have swept about its walls.

The people are of mixed ancestry, though the Aryan race predominates in all the towns and cities; but in the country, the peasants and the wandering shepherds are of Mongolian or Turkish descent. The habits and customs of these people are a peculiar mixture of those of their parent races. Their language is a product of grafting a Turkish dialect upon the Aryan tongue, which forms the basis of our own speech. Yet from their not far distant neighbors, the Chinese, they have adopted the tea-drinking habit, and a large number of words which they use daily, as we do those which we have taken from the Spaniards, the Indians and many others.

In religion, nearly all Eastern Turkestan is nominally Mohammedan, following freely the polygamous marriage customs of that belief. Theirs, however, is a very degenerate form of Mohammedanism, as the inspiration of early belief has disappeared and the ruling motive of the priests is now greed of personal gain. The people outside of the cities have preserved many of the good qualities of the stock from which they sprang, the diligence and perseverance of the Mongolian and the rectitude and reverence of the ancient Turk. All the inhabitants of the cities, especially the richer classes, are openly and grossly sensual. The laxity of Mohammedan marriage laws is here carried to the extreme.

Fine examples of Arabic architecture and wonderful written monuments of Arabian literature testify to the once high level of civilization which this land enjoyed. But now all is decayed. The marvelous mosaics of the mosques are breaking, and there is no one who knows how, or cares, to repair them. The gilt is gone from their minarets, and the wisdom of their scholars is only pretense.

The Tomb of Tamerlane, Near Samarkand

Eastern Turkestan is made up of great barren table-lands and deep, narrow but fertile and well-watered valleys. In these, the vegetation is greatly diversified and many grains and fruits are grown that range almost from the sub-tropical to those of the most northern States of America. On the uplands, vast herds of cattle and sheep graze. It was from Turkestan that the Karakul sheep, whose dressed pelt has become so popular as a fur, was imported to Texas.

Though the geographers tell us that the inland seas which constitute the basis of the water supply of all Southern Asia are rapidly growing smaller, the Russian Government is taking steps to improve the condition of this land by increased railway facilities. The line which now connects the city of Samarkand with Bokhara is to be extended to Tashkend for the transportation of grain, tea, oil, tobacco and the animal products of the country.

Under Russian rule, modernizing influences are working strongly in this almost forgotten land which, from the time of Alexander the Great till its absorption by the European power in 1854, one conqueror after another devastated and built on the ruins he had created. In 712 A.D., the Arabs invaded the land and introduced learning and civilization. Tashkend and its neighboring city, Samarkand, flourished under Mohammedan rule until about 1390, when they fell a prey to the lust of conquest of Timur Lang or Tamerlane. That remarkable Oriental spent thirty years of his life in subjugating the territory surrounding his native country.

From the borders of China to the Caspian Sea and from the steppes of Russia to the Persian Gulf, he made himself master by sheer force. In 1399 he was proclaimed Emperor of Hindustan at Delhi. What history might have been, had not the designs of the Turkish Sultan soon compelled Timur to return to Samarkand, his capital, is hard to imagine. After a brief rest, he invaded Syria and brought Persia, Armenia, Georgia and Circassia to his feet. In his seventieth year he planned an invasion of China, but died before he reached the frontier. His body "was embalmed with musk and rose water, wrapped in linen, laid in an ebony coffin and sent to Samarkand, where it was buried," in the great tomb which he had built for himself. Timur was guilty of the most inhuman atrocities. Nothing can excuse his cold-blooded massacres of thousands of prisoners and non-combatants. Immediately after his death, the empire he had conquered but not consolidated was broken up, and for the next three and a half centuries, the Mongolians, the Tartars, the Arabs and all the mixed nomadic tribes of "the top of the world" fought and pillaged about these ancient cities.

These centuries of wars and massacres, unceasing civil strife between parties disputing for supremacy in the name of religion, conspiracies and appeals to foreigners, have hastened the decay of the Mohammedan civilization which once made these inland cities the light of Asia.

The only concerted missionary enterprises in Turkestan are carried on by the British and Foreign Bible Society, which has translated the Bible into a number of the Turkish dialects and wages continual war against the indifference and degeneracy of Mohammedanism. T. R. MCNALLY.

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I think it a very beautiful thought that of making the Children's Paradise a memorial to Dr. Klopsch. I think it more appropriate than any other. Dr. Klopsch's love and life seemed given more to that work than to any other of his great benevolences.

Sincerely,

Plague Follows Famine in China

Missionaries Make a Further Appeal for Relief

Types in the Anhui Famine Districts

An Aged Sufferer

A Native Official Famine Relief Committee

IF THERE ever was a time when China needed the sympathy and aid of the Christian world, it is now. With famine sweeping off thousands in the eastern central provinces and even as far south as Hunan, and with deadly plague menacing the northern provinces, from Manchuria to Peking, the old empire is in a truly pitiful plight. From Manchuria, where the plague—which is of the pneumonic type and quite as deadly as the bubonic—seems to have originated, it is spreading westward and southwestward. In the districts near Harbin, the dead lie unburied in the streets, and the house-yards. An exodus southward of foreign officials and strangers has already begun at Peking. There are grave fears that the peril may become more serious as the season advances.

News from the famine provinces gives little encouragement to hope for any improvement before the end of March or middle of April. The latest remittance of $5,000 from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Relief Fund has been received by the missionaries and the gifts of our readers have already been converted into life-giving, nourishing food for the famishing people of Anhui and sections of Kiang-su. Rev. H. S. Ferguson, of the Christian Inland Mission, Shanghai, sends this message by cable:

"SHANGHAI, January 24.

'CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"Money received through State Department. Large sums urgently needed. Distribution in famine districts actively proceeding.

"FERGUSON."

The Chin-kiang Committee is hard at work and may be depended upon for good results, but the means at its disposal are wholly disproportionate to the vastness of the need. It is earnestly hoped that contributions to the Fund will flow in at a liberal rate during the next few weeks, as the time of keenest want and suffering is approaching when relief will be of the greatest service in saving life and lessening suffering.

Caravans of the Starving

One of the missionaries at Hwai Yuen, in the centre of the famine districts (Dr. Samuel Cochran, in charge of Hope Hospital), sends this graphic account of famine conditions:

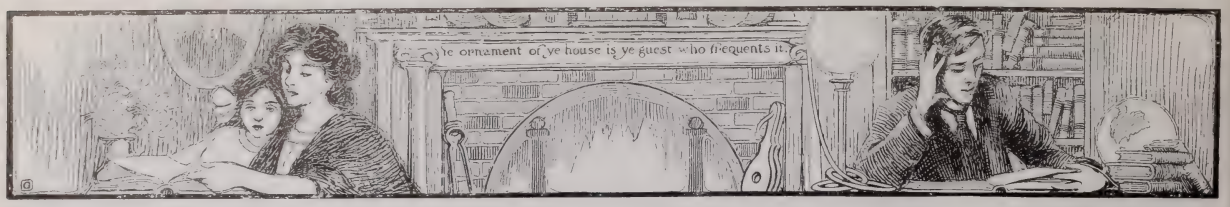
"The people have left their homes in great numbers, wandering away to the south by families to see if they can in some way or other live through to the spring by begging or by public bounty from the imperial or official granaries. In each village, out of twenty families, twelve or fifteen will thus escape south, leaving three or four of the better provided to watch the buildings.

"Of all the distressing sights of this poverty-afflicted land none is so distressing as that of these little family caravans so characteristic of famine years. The father pushes a barrow on which is an iron pot, a small bag of wheat or rice, a rice bowl or two, one or two extra garments and one or two of the younger children. The mother walks in front helping to pull the barrow by a rope and also carrying the youngest baby, only a few months old. Older children walk alongside.

Begging Along the Highways

"As they go they gather up stray straw and grass to cook the next meal. At noon they stop and dig a hole in the ground, over which they set the pot and cook a meal of gruel. At night they sleep in a temple or in some doorway, without much if any bedding. They may be able to find some place where there is a little more to be had by begging or public alms, and then they set up a pair of straw mats into a hut, shaped like the top of an old prairie schooner, joining a settlement of such refugees beside the city wall, and there they spend the winter. They are ragged and squalid beyond description, and those that do not die are living next door to starvation and in the spring may die of relapsing and typhus fevers. Others have feet frozen by the winter's frosts, crippling them for life even if their lives are spared. So you will understand what a constant and absorbing topic is that of the weather and the crops to every one here, even the rich.

"Furthermore, famine years breed bandits and disorder. Desperation makes them bold and life and property are not safe outside the towns."



Many of the contributions sent to the Fund this week are accompanied by very touching letters. A friend in Palmer, Mass., sends a gift which he states "is the remainder of a fund promised for God's service, sent with a prayer that it may save one life for time and eternity." Two little boys, Joseph and Willie Furneaux, of Carrollton, Tex., send $5. Their mother writes: "When I read to them of the sufferings of the Chinese, little Joe said: 'Mama, let me send my quarter,' and his little brother said: 'I'll send mine too'." "I have a special interest in China," writes B. F. H., Bridgeton, N. J. ($10), having a beloved daughter there a missionary." Many implore God's blessing on the gifts they enclose. "You said in the paper," writes one contributor, "that one dollar might save a life. I pray with all my heart that this poor gift of mine may be so honored to God's glory." "I pray that this mite may keep some poor soul from perishing and that those who are blessed with abundance may be prompted to give freely," writes "Two Friends," Walnut, N. C. "May he take it and multiply it abundantly," writes C. B., Indianapolis, Ind. ($5). These are examples of many hundreds of other letters which show that the hearts of God's people are ever open to the cry of suffering and that they esteem it a joy and a privilege to have a share in the great work of life-saving and soul-winning in China.

BY THE GLOW OF THE FIRELIGHT

The Mid-Year Examinations

By MARGARÈT E. SANGSTER

THE school and college year has its times of high-tide. One of these occurs in February, when boys and girls are deep in the excitement of the mid-year testing and reviewing, in order to gauge the student progress and decide upon promotions. Here and there among private schools for girls this mid-year examination is omitted, and there are several schools in which examinations are not a prominent feature. In boys' schools and in the colleges and universities open to both sexes examinations at this particular period are the rule. The only exception to be made as to their advantage, and almost the only criticism that can fairly be passed upon them, is that they should not be too highly considered, nor should their results invariably take the place of the student's term work. Nearly all the mid-year examinations are in writing, and this is much better and far fairer than oral examinations can be. There are boys and girls who do fairly well in their ordinary work and yet go to pieces when confronted with examination papers. The time limit disturbs them. They see before them a number of questions and propositions, the answers and solutions to which are safely tucked away in their brains, but it seems impossible for them to find the right words to say and the right things to do at the required moment. A good deal of cramming is done and no little nervous anxiety is undergone during this time of the mid-years. Fathers and mothers smile at the preoccupied air and the intense solicitude of the young people in high school who are afraid they may not pass, and walk about as if they carried a weight fit for older heads and broader shoulders. This is especially a time for sympathy between home and school. Give the children every opportunity to prepare themselves thoroughly for what is to them a serious crisis. Don't forget the absent ones away from home to whom this period in the college year is momentous. Take time to write cheery letters to the absent one, and do not complain if the return letters are a little delayed or briefer than you hoped.

There is no use in telling young people over and over that they are living their happiest times while they are in school. The fact is that few of us appreciate our happiest times in the present. We look back and see with a curious sense half of satisfaction and half of regret that we have had days rose-crowned and honey-sweet. Why did we not know how beautiful they were when we were living in the midst of them? Why were we so occupied with pleasure as to let it glide by without adequate thankfulness? The children and young people may work hard and grow weary over their mid-year examinations. Nevertheless, they have a certain thrill of high resolve and joyous emulation during their progress, and they are a part of training for the real life to which youth is the stepping stone. The home itself is never more fortunate, interesting and full of delightful activity than when it clasps hands with the school, in the lives of the children.

England and the Suffragettes What is the matter with John Bull? Stiff-necked and obstinate he has always been. Tennyson well said of England in a strong line that "Freedom slowly broadened down from precedent to precedent." If the progress of freedom in the land across the sea has been slow, it has been sure, and there has seldom been lacking a contingent of thoughtful people open to conviction at least and willing to look at both sides of the shield even in a country so conservative as England. The ancient boast that England loves fair play is out of date and discounted at this hour by the shameful treatment to which the Suffragettes are constantly subjected. Whatever we may think of their cause, and however we may hitherto have regretted some of their methods, nothing is now left for us but sympathy with women beaten and tortured ruthlessly by brutal policemen, and treated with contempt and disdain by men in power who apparently have parted with the last shred of chivalry and the last grain of common sense.

The women who have proved that they are in deadly earnest on the subject of the ballot, and who for its sake have courted persecution and accepted martyrdom, have been jeered at by the press, flouted by such clever writers as Mr. Chesterton, and humiliated by statesmen like Mr. Asquith and Mr. Winston Churchill. The day, it seems to us, has passed for civilized men to treat civilized women with the knock-down argument of the club. Our English cousins have never refused, but, on the contrary, have eagerly sought, the co-operation and assistance of women in political elections. Yet now they refuse them the right of petition.

No one on either side of the sea asserts in these days that woman is inferior to man. It is taken for granted in our educational systems that there is no sex in brain. More and more on this side of the water the question is not shall women vote, but how soon will they vote? The question is purely one of economic convenience. It is foolish to encumber it with a lot of insignificant details which have positively no relation to the present situation. The leaders of the Suffragist movement in England are gentlewomen. They are not in any sense of the words vulgar, ignorant or commonplace. We begin to be afraid that they have better understood than the outside world the stubbornness and stupidity of the English politician. They are matrons and single women, and therefore in their ranks are included mothers, wives, daughters, sisters and sweethearts. The men of England are going too far when they suffer such women to be dragged about in the streets until they have sprained ankles, dislocated fingers and broken heads. We repeat: What is England thinking about?

Mothers Meet and Talk It Over Can you not remember when you were a child how once a week, or once a fortnight, a feeling of something like awe crept over you when you knew that ten or twenty of the neighborhood mothers were assembled that afternoon in your own mother's parlor, all dressed in their best bibs and tuckers, and all engaged in talking about the boys and girls. You, perhaps, were not very much opposed to this meeting of mothers, because in your house it was always accompanied by an appetizing aroma of cake and the fragrance of coffee. The coffee would certainly not fall to your share, but you might come in for remainder doughnuts and raisin cake. You might even be asked to pass the refreshments, and the mothers of your friends would smile at you or, on the other hand, embarrass you by inquiring how far you had gone in arithmetic, whether you were studying French, and whether you were a real help to your mother. You always cherished a feeling of dislike for the inquisitor who insisted upon the last particular, for in your heart you knew that you were less helpful than you ought to be. The mother's meeting of the olden day was often devotional in character. Much of the time was given to Scripture reading and prayer, and from those sacred hours good fruit was gathered in later days when the children trained in piety grew up to take their places among men and women. Our mothers' meetings as we shall have a glimpse of them in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be largely interested in the best way of bringing up our active girls and boys. We shall hope to say something from time to time about the babies. The young mother, the mother in her meridian with her young people growing up, and the grandmother in her lovely Indian summer will be among those who shall come to our meeting and freely talk over, with a different leader at each meeting, the affairs that concern the child and the home.

"LITTLE MOTHERS" IN JAPAN

Taking care of the babies as best they can,
See these little mothers of old Japan.
Each is proud of the baby dear,
Whom she carries about with right good cheer.
Praises its tiny hands and feet,
Calls it names caressing and sweet.

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I wish to express my interest in, and approval of, a plan to endow the Children's Paradise as a monument to its founder Dr. Klopsch. I know of no more beautiful and worthy charity than Mont-Lawn. With hearty appreciation,

Gainsborough's Famous Portrait, "Duchess of Devonshire"

OLD VALENTINE

What conscience, say, is it in thee,
When I a heart had one,
To take away that heart from me,
And to retain thy own?

For shame or pity now incline
To play a loving part;
Either to send me kindly thine,
Or give me back my heart.

Covet not both; but if thou dost
Resolve to part with neither,
Why, yet to show that thou art just,
Take me and mine together!

RED LETTER DAYS IN FEBRUARY

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS: February is the littlest month of all, yet in it there are so many Red Letter days.

For anniversary parties and celebrations there is almost o month that is so full of sugges- on. Musical clubs, big and little, onor Mendelssohn's birthday on ebruary 3 with programmes of orks of the great Music Master.

Dickens Character Parties

T IS growing very popular indeed to celebrate Charles Dickens' irthday on February 7 with a haracter party." I wish you boys nd girls might see the pretty cos- mes and tableaux for a Dickens arty that we are planning. The ery prettiest picture of all so far , I believe, Jennie Wren, the Doll's ressmaker in Our Mutual Friend. he sits on a little old chair, at bandy-legged table covered with olls and materials for dolls' dresses. he has a shock of pretty yellow air, and the picture as she sits and ews is lovely.

Little Nell and her Grandfather, rom The Old Curiosity Shop, are ne. Two funny little boys we now are coming as the Artful odger and Barnaby Rudge. David opperfield and Barcus and Peg- otty Ham and Dora and Alice will ll be there. Mrs. Jarley is to give performance of her famous wax orks.

Sam Weller and Mr. Weller are oing to recite the famous Valentine scene from The Pick- ick Papers. Paul and Florence Domby, Mr. Pickwick and he Fat Boy, Tommy Traddles, Oliver Twist, Dolly Varden, re all coming, and I am telling you about it because I hink it is such a charming uggestion, with so many de- ightful possibilities in it for aving a real good and happy ime, that many of you will plan o get up, some time in Febru- ry, a Dickens Character Party.

February 10th, 12th, 14th

AT HOME, in Kentucky, in the old days, we once planned and carried out a Lamb's Tales from Shakes- peare party on Charles Lamb's birthday on February 10.

Then there is, greatest of all, Lincoln's Birthday. Remember, girls and boys, nobody ever dreamed that the little back- woods boy, who first opened his eyes on this splendid world ten years after the death of Washington, way yonder in the wilds of Kentucky, would by his perseverence, his industry, his honesty, and his pluck, lead his nation to take its place among the great nations of the world. Lincoln planned all his life to be a great man, and when the opportunity came, he was ready. This is the whole secret of Abraham Lincoln's wonderful career in a nutshell.

I am sure you will all have lots of fun with your Valentines on the 14th, and on the 22d you will be taking part in patriotic parties with flags and marches, speeches and songs at your schools.

The Boy With the Sword
Painting by Edward Manet

The Wide Awakes

NINE girls that I know, who call themselves the Wide Awakes, are wide awake indeed, for they have planned a party at each other's houses for every Red Letter Day in February. On the 27th, they are to give an especially charming Long- fellow afternoon.

Wilbur Wright was born on Feb- ruary 28, so you up-to-date boys might plan a toy aeroplane contest, I think, to celebrate the birthday of the American pioneer aviator.

Pretty Valentine Leaflets

AS I came down Fifth Avenue this morning I noticed in the win- dow of a little shop a set of Valen- tine booklets. One of them is called Pretty Good World, by Frank L. Stockton; a fourth A Mile With Me, by Dr. Van Dyke. These leaflets are enclosed in pretty Valentine en- velopes and are only 10 cents each. If any of you older boys and girls would like to have me do it, I will gladly undertake the commission of sending out your Valentine surprises by forwarding one of these de- lightful leaflets to any one whose address you care to send to. Do not forget the two cents over and above the ten cents (cost of the Valentine) for postage.

MY VALENTINE

WHOM shall I choose for my Valentine?
Somebody, oh, so brave and fine;
So kind and good, so sweet and fair,
I'd gladly hunt her everywhere.

I'd travel east, I'd travel west,
And never take a moment's rest;
For now I think you should be mine;
Because you're such a Valentine.

HANNAH C. YOUNG, age 15.

I.

JANE: "Such a pretty Valentine! I can't believe my eyes!"

MY VALENTINE

IT was just the nicest valentine
That came to me to-day;
A pretty box, and on the top
A little letter lay.

Which said: "I know a little maid,
She isn't far to seek;
No dainty wild rose petal
Is pinker than her cheek.

"There is no shining hazelnut
That's browner than her eye;
Just look within the box, my dear;
This little maid you'll spy."

Of course I was in haste to see
So fair and sweet a lass;
I raised the lid; within I found
A tiny looking glass.

ARLINE L. CROCKER, age 13.

ABE LINCOLN

YOU can talk about Columbus,
How he sailed the sea;
You can talk about George Washington,
Who fought for liberty;
You can talk about the great men,
Alexander and the rest,
But of all the men I know of,
Abe Lincoln is the best.

FLOYD B. HUFFMAN, age 12.

HONEST ABE

WITH pluck and push and prudence
And honesty of heart
He turned his hand to anything
And nobly did his part.

And now, if I will study hard
And do just what is right,
Like "Honest Abe," I too may have
A record truly bright.

Serial Story by FLORENCE MORSE KINGSLEY

XX—Continued

MR. MORRISON, looking wildly about for a means of escape, caught sight of Jimmy running past the door, a brace of puppies frolicking at his heels.

"Hello, thar, Cap'n!" he called, "don't you want t' step in here an'——"

"The dear child," murmured Miss Cottle, wiping her eyes on her apron. "He shall be the first to share our happiness. I am going to be married to your kind old friend here, James; aren't you glad, my boy?"

Jimmy gazed doubtfully at the pair from under puckered brows.

"Married?" he echoed. "What for?"

"Say, Cap'n; you've struck the nail on the head, as usual!" cried Peg, regaining his composure with an effort. "I guess the lady don't altogether know her own mind. She was kind o' calc'latin' on bein' married t' me. But she's thought better of it b' now, an' I'm bearin' up es well as I kin under the circumstances. The' ain't goin' t' be no weddin'. No, sir!"

"Peleg!" exclaimed Miss Cottle, sharply. "You must have taken leave of your senses!"

"No, ma'am; I ain't. The Cap'n here'll bear witness that I said you'd give me up. That'll put a stop t' the talk—ef the' is any. You c'n tell 'em that. I won't deny it. I c'n stan' it."

A light as of tardy victory dawned in Miss Cottle's eyes.

"You won't deny that we've been engaged to be married?" she said slowly.

"No, ma'am; you c'n say anythin' you've a mind to. It's all the same t' me, now't you've give me up. I feel turrible bad—all broke up; but I'm a-goin' t' stan' it the best I kin. Religion'll help some, I guess. It gene'lly does. I'll try it, anyhow."

"I might reconsider," observed Miss Cottle, "before"—she added darkly—"the affair becomes public. I fear the notoriety will be very hard for you to bear, Peleg."

"It will, ma'am," replied Peg with alacrity; but I'm goin' t' try an' endure it."

Miss Cottle meditatively stirred the onions with one foot clad substantially in rusty leather.

"I shall hold you to the engagement which you have acknowledged," she said firmly, "unless——"

"What? Fer goodness sake don't keep me on tenter-hooks, ma'am! W'y, say, you don't want me! I ain't fit t' wipe m' feet on your door-mat; you've said so lots o' times; ain't she, Cap'n? I'm an ornary cuss; more ornary 'n you hev' any idee of an' I'm humbly's a hedge-fence, 'n'—'n' bad-tempered; m' disposition's somethin' fierce. The Cap'n here c'n tell you that. W'y, land! I dunno but what I'd be drove to drink, ef I was t' git married. I'll bet I would."

"If my brother-in-law's nephew should make you an offer for these onions, I feel that I ought to have a share in the proceeds," said Miss Cottle, suddenly abandoning sentiment for business. "If we were to carry out our engagement of marriage, of course I should reasonably expect to profit by the arrangement."

"No, ma'am; you wouldn't, not whilst I was alive. I'm downright stingy. That's another thing I fergot t' mention. Stingy? W'y, I'm closter 'n the bark t' a tree. I'll bet y'e wouldn't git 'nough t' eat, with me fer a pervider. But I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll give you—a hundred dollars cash, ef I sell the onions, ef you——"

"Make it two hundred, and I'll agree to let you off. You couldn't do me out of my widow's third, any way you'd fix it."

Peg stared at the determined spinster in silence for a long minute. Then with a muttered exclamation, he dashed out of the barn and disappeared.

Miss Cottle's eyes sparkled with animosity.

"If I was to sue him for breach of promise, and I could do it, too, I guess he——"

She paused in her meditation to stare wrathfully at the spectacle of the recalcitrant Peleg returning at full speed, a small, yellow-leaved book in his hand.

"Here we be, ma'am!" he exclaimed. "Now we'll see whar we're at. I gene'lly find somethin' t' fit the 'casion, an' I'll bet I kin this time."

He rapidly turned the pages with a moistened thumb and fingers.

"'Receipt fer horse linament.' No; that won't do. 'Foot an' mouth disease,' 'How t' git fat; 'n how not t' git fat,' 'Blind staggers, 'n how t' prevent;' 'Jelly cake——'"

"What," demanded Miss Cottle sharply, "is that book? And what possible connection does it have with our affairs?"

Mr. Morrison paused, his thumb in his mouth.

"W'y, this," he explained, "is my book of vallable inf'mation. I ain't never be'n exactly in this 'ere fix b'fore; but I'll bet the's inf'mation in this 'ere book 'at'll fit the case all right. You just set down, ma'am, an' make yourself comf'table, while I——"

"This is outrageous!" snapped Miss Cottle.

"Maybe I'd better run and get my book, too," volunteered Jimmy, who had been an interested but sadly puzzled spectator of the scene. "P'raps there'll be somethin' vallable in mine."

"All right, Cap'n; run 'long," said Peg briskly. "Now listen t' this, ma'am. 'The sleepin' fox ketches no poultry.' That's good; but the trouble is you 'pear to be wide awake. Hold on; don't git 'xcited. Here's a little inf'mation on the subjec' o' fools. I copied it out the almanac nigh onto twenty years ago, an' it can't be beat. ''Xperience keeps a dear school, but fools will learn in no other.' An' this, 't I got out o' a story book. 'The' ain't nothin' so becomin' t' a fool as a shet mouth.' An'——"

"I shall certainly sue for breach of promise!" announced Miss Cottle, treading recklessly among the onions on her way to the door.

"No, ma'am; you won't," qouth Peg placidly. "Whar the's be'n no promise thar c'n be no breach.' I wrote that down 'bout the year fifty-nine. I wa'nt 's old 's I be now; but I've kep' it in mind pretty constant. You fix it so't I'll sell them onions at a fair profit 'n I'll give ye a hundred dollars. 'N you c'n tell your lady friends that ol' Peg Morrison's sech a scalawag 'at you couldn't hear t' marryin' of him, not ef he was the las' man on earth. An' that's the truth. You couldn't hear t' it, an' you c'n bet I wouldn't."

"I shall leave this house to-day—-day, Peleg Morrison; do you hear?" Peg glanced up from his anxious rutiny of the pages of accumulated re with a look of deep thankfulness. "Sho! you don't say so?" he eximed. "Wall; take this 'long with u t' med'tate over: 'Run your head to a stone wall, ef you feel like doin' but don't blame the wall none fer at happens."

Jimmy running blithely toward the rn with his book of Vallable Inf'ma-on in one hand and his cherished ttle of red ink in the other, met the ate Miss Cottle on the way.

"I'm a-going to do once what I've en simply achin' to do ever since I t foot onto this place!" she cried rilly; and seizing the child by the oulder she gave him a violent shak-g, concluding with a hard-handed ap or two over the ear.

"Take that, you little tyke, you! If l a had you in hand for five years eady, with her -gone, I'd 'a' taken me of the laugh and smartness out of u! But now I wash my hands of u and her and him!"

The child, too astonished to cry out, rithed out of the spinster's bony grip.

"I 'spise you," he sputtered, "you ol' ol'—Cottle woman! 'N'—'n—I'll put in my Vallable Inf'mation book 'at u—slapped me when I was good!"

Miss Cottle made another dive at m, and was met by a copious shower red ink from the loosely corked ttle, which Jimmy discharged at his sailant with the practiced aim of e small boy. Then he took to his els, to be received into asylum by g Morrison, who was watching the oceedings from the barn door.

"Wall, Cap'n," he said, "you sure d put that red ink to good use. Don't u cry, son; I'll git ye another bottle ict es big b'fore sun-down."

He chuckled deep within his capa-ous chest as he smoothed the little y's ruffled curls with his big, horny nd.

"You an' me'll hav' to write out a tle vallable inf'mation on the subjec' females," he said slowly. "The's l kinds an' varieties of wimmen-lks; 'n t' git 'em all sorted an' labeled, 't ye won't git teetotally fooled, 'll ke the better part of a lifetime."

XXI

David had not acquainted Barbara th the result of his latest interview th Jarvis. He hated Jarvis, and he ok small pains to conceal the fact; t he jealously hid his unshaken con-ction with regard to the money, nich he had made up his mind Jarvis d given Barbara. After a little he en concluded that it need not be re-id.

"Miserly old crab," he told himself. t won't hurt him to let Barbara have at much of his pile."

Something of this thought colored s words when he discussed the ques-on with Barbara.

"You'll marry me in November, on't you?" he pleaded, "if the fellow esn't show up before then? We can y him all right—if we have to."

"If we have to?" echoed Barbara, ith a straight look at him. "Why do u say that?"

"It's a good bit of money—four ousand dollars. Perhaps some—er philanthropical jay gives it to you tright, Barbie. I shouldn't be so ry much surprised."

He laughed at the proud curl of her s.

"You wouldn't care, would you," he rsisted, "if some old duffer had taken into his noddle to do a good deed? nce we are married, I shan't bother unearth him, you'd better believe. m in favor of letting sleeping phil-thropists lie—eh, Barbie?"

"We'll not be married," Barbara said in a low voice, "till——"

He caught her suddenly about the waist and stopped the words with one of his close kisses.

"You shan't say it," he murmured, his lips still on hers.

She twisted sharply out of his grasp, her face crimsoning slowly.

"I wish—you wouldn't, David."

"Wouldn't what, little wife?" he drawled, reaching for her lazily from his comfortable seat in the corner of the sofa.

"I am not your wife," she said coldly.

"Pretty near!" he laughed.

His eyes, vividly blue and sparkling under their long curling lashes, met hers with a look which she silently resented.

"I have sold the apples on the trees," she said presently, seating herself near the window, under pretense of getting a better light on her sewing.

David yawned audibly, and thrust his hands into his trousers pockets.

"You have—eh?"

"Yes; and for a good price, as prices go, Peg says."

"How much?" he wanted to know.

She told him, and he shook his head.

"Do y' know, that old Morrison is a fool. I mean to get rid of him, when I take charge here."

Barbara was silent.

"The old chap doesn't know enough to last over night," pursued David. "I don't believe you'd ever have gotten into such a hole financially, if it hadn't been for his running things into the ground. What you want is a couple of capable young men about the place. Of course we'll keep some decent horses. I've bought one already, a beauty! Come out and look at him, Barbie. Or, say, put on your hat and I'll take you for a spin. We'll take in the county fair, if you say so. It's in full blast to-day."

She arose and folded her work.

"Not to-day, David; I've bread to bake. But I'll come out and look at your horse."

"You're getting so confoundedly difficult, Barbara. I never know how to take you," complained David, as they walked, a little apart, along the gravel path.

He turned to look at her and was struck afresh by her beauty. During the long days of the summer that was past, she seemed to have bloomed into a new and more vivid loveliness.

"If you weren't such a tearing beauty," he said, under his breath, "I don't know as I could stand for it long. You're forever treading on a fellow's toes; did you know it, Barbie? Now, I like a woman to be sweet and nice."

He smiled at the vision of Jennie, the pink-cheeked waitress at the Barford Eagle, which chose to obtrude itself at the moment. The humble, almost suppliant look of adoration in her childish blue eyes had lately afforded David a vast amount of indolent amusement.

"A woman," he went on, dictatorially, "ought not to be always thinking of herself."

"I know that, David," Barbara said meekly. "I try not to. But——"

"That's just it!" he broke in quickly, "there's always a 'but' in your mind and in your attitude towards me, and always has been. You needn't deny it," he added, openly complacent, in view of his own cleverness. "I know women."

The girl looked at him in silence, a mutinous question behind her closed lips.

Discouragement a Temptation

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

The Flight of Elijah

WHEN we contrast the fearless fight waged by Elijah on the mount with his fearful flight to the juniper bush we feel amazed that his faith in God should so suddenly have given place to abject fear of a defeated woman. Every observant person knows, however, that such is not uncommon. Frequently the courage which gains a triumph is quickly followed by the cowardice which brings defeat. This should teach us that the hour of exaltation is the time to most carefully guard against the tide of depression.

The case of Elijah exhibiting cringing cowardice after displaying commanding courage is most instructive, if we regard it in the right light. Elijah was "a man of like passions with us" (James 5: 17). Let us remember that he faced unflinchingly without trace of fear not only the powerful King Ahab, but hundreds of the frantic priests of Baal and Astarte, the ready tools of Jezebel, and in addition the infuriated mob that followed the priests as leaders. He was enabled to do this because he "practised the presence of God." While he kept his eyes upon God he saw no fear. But he became elated by the victory God gave him on Mount Carmel, and also because of the little cloud that gave promise of the rain for which he prayed when the people turned to Jehovah. Then came exhaustion after great physical strain. He had had a long run before Ahab's chariot as the latter's herald, coming back to the city where he was acclaimed by those who had been at Carmel as greater than the king himself. This great athletic feat completely exhausted him, and while in this state came the threat of the defeated Jezebel that she would kill him. He should have ridiculed such a threat from a routed foe, he to whom God had vouchsafed so many favors, he who was kept from death by being fed by ravens and afterwards by the poor widow, and who was delivered from the wrath of monarch and mob at Carmel. But he fled, fled in fear, nor did he recover courage even as he passed Bethel, where he must have recalled how, trembling, Jacob saw the open door of heaven with God keeping watch above his own. Nor did he turn about when the towers of Jerusalem recalled the triumphant psalms of David, nor even at Beersheba, where the wells at which he drank should have recalled the courage of Abraham and Isaac. Heeding not the scenes of victories of ancient patriarchs, he hurried on, forgetting to eat in the excitement of his fear, until he was far out in the wilderness. Utterly exhausted, with no suitable shelter in sight, he sat down beneath a juniper bush, a kind of broom, the scant foliage of which would at least shelter his face from the sun. In his wretchedness, he turned his eyes to heaven and prayed that he might die. But God would not answer that prayer, for it was a foolish and a cowardly prayer. The prayers of folly or those that emanate from a wrong motive are never answered. No request is granted which is not for our good. Had Elijah's prayer been answered he would have died a coward in the desert, but God did not want him to die that way. He had designed that when his earthly mission was complete the prophet should pass to heaven in a chariot of fire. We should never recall this dark episode in Elijah's life without calling rible tones: "What doest thou here?" To the idle rich God calls: "What doest thou here?" and he makes the same demand of the idle poor. Here is the father of a family who has lost his position and finds it hard to get another; he quits the battle and lives in idleness on child labor or wife labor. A whole family look for support to one individual, perhaps a self-sacrificing sister, or a willing brother. A lazy youth depends upon an old mother to feed him as he sits beneath the juniper tree of cowardice fearing to face the world and earn his own living. To all of these comes the individual challenge: "What doest thou here?"

The Still Small Voice

Any one with the faculty of imagination can picture for himself the moving panorama of nature by which God taught Elijah how to improve his work as a prophet when he went back presently to his duty. As he stood on Mount Sinai, perhaps where Moses stood when Jehovah gave him the Decalogue amid thunderings and lightnings and tempest, God revealed himself to Elijah in a great strong wind that rent the mountain; then came an earthquake that made the mountains like the waters of the storm-tossed sea; then a fire, mighty as the resistless forest fires that defy the power of man; and after the fire a still small voice, the articulate revelation of God.

We can hardly doubt that this acted parable of wind and earthquake and fire had in it something of correction and instruction in righteousness for Elijah in his methods of popular reformation. It would seem to be a hint that such a religious storm as he brought on at Carmel might not do so much as he expected toward frightening the people back to God. God was in it, but he would be yet more powerfully in the word of reconciliation when Elijah would go back as the "voice" for God.

The mightiest force in soul-saving is a human voice speaking to the outward ear "a word in season" just at the time when God is speaking to the soul. The battle of light and darkness is most often won by light through its might of gentleness. The triumphs of the "true light" are timely meditations for this lesson on the still small voice.

Conquering Difficulties

What a triumphant return had the fugitive Elijah when God told him: "Return and anoint Hazael and Jehu and Elisha." It was a great honor that he should be called to anoint two kings and a prophet, but there were yet other victories in store for him. No less an honor does God put upon us, however unfaithful we have been, when we "return"—he gives us the privilege of anointing human souls to be kings and priests, and winning thousands over to a living Gospel. We read of a preacher who resigned the ministry because it presented so many difficulties that he had no time for golf. Contrast such a man with Livingstone, who refusing to leave Africa cried out: "Pray God to heal this open sore of the world"; or with Xavier, who prayed for greater difficulties to overcome; or with Damien, who turned his back on home and friends to minister to the outcast lepers of Molokai; or with Harrington or Pilkington, who gave their lives for their work, or with Melville Cox, who, dying in Liberia, cried out like unto Livingstone: "Let a thousand perish ere Africa be given up." These men encountered difficulties to overcome them. 'Tis for us to do likewise, to let no discouragement be a temptation to us, to persevere until victory is won and thus set an example for others to follow. God will assist us; he will not leave us alone if we trust in him and rely upon his strength.

Try This on the Boy Some Morning

Put a dish of each ready-cooked cereal before him and let him make his own choice.

Let him see with the rest Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice—these gigantic, crisp, porous grains. He'll be curious to try them and, when he does, he'll find that they taste like nuts.

That will settle his choice. Then the armies of children who love Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice will have a new recruit.

Perhaps he will want them morning, noon and night—sometimes with cream and sugar, sometimes mixed with bananas, sometimes—like crackers—in a bowl of milk.

The more he wants the better. For these are whole-grain foods made wholly digestible—the only such foods in existence.

That's How We Found Out

We made a similar test for many months, by conducting a lunch counter in the heart of New York.

We wanted to learn—as you do—what cereals folks like best. For we make cereal foods in sixteen forms, but we advertise only what people seem to prefer.

So we served all sorts of ready-cooked cereals, all at an equal price. And four people in five chose Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice, just as your boy will do.

Since then we have helped a million homes to enjoy them, just as you will in yours.

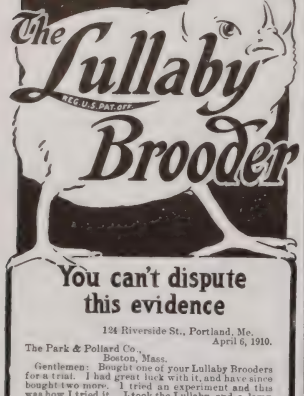
Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c

Except in extreme West

These are the foods shot from guns—the foods with every starch granule exploded by Prof. Anderson's process.

The grains are put in sealed guns, then the guns are revolved in a heat of 550 degrees. The moisture in the grain is turned to steam, and that steam explodes when the guns are unsealed. The result is to blast the food granules to pieces so the digestive juices act instantly. The grains are puffed to eight times natural size. But the coats of the grains are unbroken.

The result is unique, enticing, digestible—the most desired and most desirable of all the ready-cooked cereals.



Why Grocers Run Out

When grocers run out of Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice it isn't our fault now. It used to be. Many a time we have been far behind orders. For the demand has jumped until people are eating 15,000,000 dishes per month.

But three of our factories are now equipped with these guns. Your grocer now has no excuse for running out of these popular foods. Please insist that he keep you supplied.

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

E. F., Kearney, Neb. What States made the greatest and least strides in population within the past ten years?

The State of Washington had an increase of more than 120 per cent. In 1900 its population was 518,103; in 1910, 1,141,990. The State of Iowa decreased .3 per cent. In 1900 the population was 2,231,853; in 1910, 2,224,771.

J. B., Waco, Tex. 1. How many Jews are there in America? 2. In what cities are the Jews most numerous?

1. 11,817,783. 2. New York City has the largest Jewish population in the world, 1,062,000; Warsaw, with 254,712, comes next; Budapest (186,047) is third, Vienna (146,926) is fourth and London (144,300) is fifth.

Ellen B., Trenton, N. J. What does Paul mean by "laying aside every weight"?

The passage in Heb. 12: 1 means that we are to personally apply discipline, and with divine help to thrust from us all temptations to carnal and worldly indulgence, which would impede our progress in the spiritual race. These obstacles are of the character mentioned in Mark 9: 42-48; Eph. 4: 22; Col. 3: 9, 10. In practical terms, we should include undesirable and unprofitable amusements, doubtful associates, foolish pride, habitual ill-nature or worry, planning things far ahead, striving for social show for appearance's sake, deceitfulness, gossip, profanity, exaggeration or untruth—in a word, the "familiar sins," and especially the one which does "so easily beset us," whatever it may be. All of these act as chains and drags to hold us back.

J. R. M., Archer, Fla. 1. Where did the pillar of cloud and fire first appear before the Children of Israel to lead them? Did it lead them in their wanderings in the wilderness after they turned back at Kadesh Barnea? 2. Was the tabernacle that Moses made carried into the promised land?

1. The pillar of cloud and fire, which was the manifestation of the Divine Presence, came immediately after the rearing of the Tabernacle (see Ex. 40: 34). Its last appearance is mentioned in Num. 20: 6, when the people were murmuring in Kadesh in the fortieth year of the wandering. The final reference is Deut. 31: 15, just before the death of Moses. 2. The Tabernacle was a national sanctuary during all their wanderings. Its subsequent history may be gathered from Josh. 4: 19; 8: 30-35; 9: 6; 10: 15, 43; 9: 27; 18: 1; 19: 51; 22: 12.

H. G., Markleysburg, Pa. Did Paul intimate that a woman should have some covering on her head beside her hair when she prayed?

Yes, and he had a laudable and proper purpose in making the suggestion, although the cause of it was purely a local one. Social conditions in Corinth at the time were such as to call forth Paul's censure. He desired that Christian women should be different from the women he had in view, and that they should be distinguished by modesty and seemly behavior, especially in public gatherings and in the congregations.

H. E. D., Rehersburg, Pa. I notice in THE MAIL-BAG of October 12 in answer to a question you state that we are all sinners. We are told in I. John 1: 9 that "if we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." Col. 3: 3: "For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God." Rom. 6: 2: "How shall we that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?" Read Rom. 6. Webster's definition of "sinner" is "One that has voluntarily violated the divine law; a moral agent who has voluntarily disobeyed any divine precept, or neglected any known duty." It is used in contradistinction to Saint, to denote an unregenerate person; one who has not received the pardon of his sins. Paul in his Epistles to the Corinthians, Ephesians, Philippians and others, addressed them as "Saints"; now, if we are all sinners, why did he not so address them? I think it would be little encouragement to sinners to try to persuade them to get saved and then tell them that they will still be sinners.

In a certain sense, H. E. D. is no doubt right. Yet as long as we are in the flesh, natural sin remains; none are perfect, and our best efforts fall short of the ideal, but sin—that is, actual or involuntary sin arising from imperfection—is no longer attributed to one who is in Christ and whose errors and short-comings are covered. We stand justified in God's sight, not because of our own worthiness or sinlessness, but by virtue of Christ's righteousness. For his sake, sin is no longer imputed to us, and we are accepted as perfect through his perfection. See Col. 2: 10; Eph. 5: 27; II. Cor. 5: 21. The perfection of sincerity is expressed in Job 1: 1; Isa. 38: 3; comparative perfection of those advanced in faith, knowledge and sanctification in I. John 2: 13; I. Cor. 2: 6; Phil. 3: 15; perfection of degrees in Rom. 7: 24; Phil. 3: 12; I. John 1: 8. The struggle for perfection is described in many passages. See Rom. 8: 12; Col. 2: 10; 4: 12; Matt. 5: 28, etc., but these and others point clearly to an ideal standard, which, though we may never wholly attain it in this life, is always to be kept steadily in view.

M. B., Decatur, Ia. What are the signs of an early spring?

There are no infallible signs, although many are often quoted, such as wild geese flying northward, buds sprouting, robins appearing, snakes leaving their holes, etc. Some profess to recognize indications of a mild winter and early spring in the early fall of the leaves. The Weather Bureau in Washington refuses to recognize such indications.

Mrs. J. W. S., Bridgeport, Wash. Did Christ's mother or any one else know that he was to be our divine Saviour until he was baptized? Did he know it? Our Bible class teacher says that Christ did not know he was to be our Saviour until he was baptized and that his mother did not know it either. I think that at the time Christ came to the temple at twelve he knew all, and I believe his mother always knew after the angel appeared to her before his birth.

That Mary knew is evident from Matt. 1: 20-25; 2: 11-15; Luke 1: 30-56; 2: 19 and other passages. Nor is there any reason to doubt that Jesus himself early realized his divinity if not the full scope of his mission. See Luke 2: 42-52. He did not, however, enter fully upon his work until after he was baptized and had received the manifestation of the Holy Spirit. It is useless to speculate on the extent of such knowledge at certain periods, and whatever we may say on the subject would be simply speculation. In many recorded instances, his ominscience is so obvious that it cannot be denied. As the mission of Jesus unfolded itself, he was prepared for it at every stage, and he many times foreshadowed its development in his prophecies and his conversations with his disciples.

B. N. M., Louisville. Who were the Mission Indians?

Indians of Southern California who in the eighteenth century were Christianized by Spanish missionaries. They were of many tribes and dialects, but chief among them were the Yumas and the Shoshones. Father Junipero Serra and others who came after him, succeeded in gathering them into communities, and mission houses and chapels were built and vineyards planted. The work began about 1776 and continued to 1831, when the Indians numbered about 19,000. With the overthrow of Spanish power by the Mexicans, a period of confiscation and destruction began, which continued to 1840; the friars were banished, the missions abandoned, and the Indians driven back to the deserts and the mountains. Soon after the Civil War some effort was made to care for them, but they have dwindled until now only about 2,000 remain.

E. S. M., Burton City, O. What is the law in New York State concerning the keeping in repair of a rural cemetery?

A rural cemetery association, incorporated under the Act of 1847, is the legal owner in fee of the lands purchased for burial purposes; the lot holders merely acquire a usufructuary interest, therefore all assessments and repairs for local (not individual) improvement should be against the entire premises.

O. D. S., Wilson, N. C. Did not John the Baptist recognize Jesus as the Messiah or Saviour when he came to him at the river Jordan and asked John to baptize him? Or is it a fact that John did not know who Jesus was until after he had baptized him, and the Holy Spirit descended on him in the shape of a dove and a voice proclaimed him the Son of God? Some contend that John had never heard of Jesus and did not know of him until this time; while others say John knew Jesus at once when he saw him coming.

It is not conceivable that John should have been permitted to baptize the Son of God without being able to distinguish him from the common multitude. But he had no authority to proclaim him as the Son of God until he saw the predicted sign in the descent of the Holy Ghost upon him. Further, the two were related, in the human sense, and even though they may have lived at a distance from each other, it is not to be supposed that they had not heard of each other.

B. R. B., Keyport, N. J. Explain Job 19: 26.

The language of the older version is changed by the more accurate translation in the Revised Version, to "yet without my flesh," etc. We don't know the book mentioned in your letter.

Reader, Heyworth, Ill. In a family where the man and woman are both Christians, and use the same pocketbook, the woman feels called upon to give more to Christian purposes than they now give. Would it be right for her to give without her husband knowing it? He thinks they have given enough and need not give more.

The wiser way, instead of acting independently, is to act in concert and with a perfect mutual understanding. A Christian husband will recognize his wife's right to her own views in this matter, if these are not extreme, and will assist rather than hinder her in carrying them out, if within his power. Their interests are mutual and nothing should be done to disturb mutual confidence in each other.

Reader, Lockport, N. Y. Why do not the Quakers believe in singing or in baptism?

They hold that "There is one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all" (Eph. 4: 5, 6). They believe the "washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost" is the one baptism essential to salvation, contending that the baptism of Christ was inward and spiritual as shown by Matt. 3: 11, 12; Acts 1: 5 and 18: 25, 26; 1. Cor. 12: 13 and 6: 11; Col. 2: 20-23 and I. Pet. 3: 21. As to singing, they simply hold it to be unnecessary.

C. H. M., Braddock, Pa. 1. Where was Noah's Ark built? Where was the window? How were the lower stories lighted? Why did Noah send out birds, instead of looking out himself? 2. Was Methuselah saved in the Ark?

1. No special locality is indicated in the Genesis narrative. Josephus, the famous Jewish historian, in relating the story of the Ark, speaks of "the land of Siriad," which is indefinite, and speculation, however fascinating, is useless here. The Ark was not a vessel in the ordinary sense, but a large oblong floating house, evidently with no side windows, but lighted and ventilated from the top (see Gen. 6: 16; 8: 13). Had there been side windows Noah could have seen for himself the condition of the receding flood, but he had recourse to a bird which could fly from the upper opening. 2. The death of Methuselah is recorded in Gen. 5: 27.

Miscellaneous

Subscriber, Neb. If you will send your full address we will give you privately the information you ask.

Mrs. D. M. G., Guinea Mills, Va. The points of view are different regarding Sabbath observance. Each denomination naturally considers itself entitled to hold to its own interpretation.

Constant Reader, Malden, Mass. Different authorities construe the Word differently with regard to infant baptism, and it is practically impossible to reconcile these conflicting opinions, all being equally honest and sincere.

G. G. G., Marksboro, N. J. 1. You are doubtless right. The trouble is that most voters put the "conscience vote" aside at elections, and choose the least of two evils on the other tickets, believing that conscience votes would be wasted. 2. See Nahum 2: 4.

Mrs. C. M. P., Gayersville, Calif. That is the teaching of the Roman Church, but not of Protestantism. The act of taking communion has no saving grace in itself. It is a sign and seal that we are already Christ's and a sacred commemoration of his life and sacrifice for our sins.

Mrs. W. J. LsB., Worcester, Mass. It is true that modern theologians differ in their interpretation of the passages you mention; but the fact remains that, however they may argue, the ultimate separation of the wicked from the righteous carries with it the logical idea of retributive justice. Further, in the Old Testament the conception of a future state was indefinite. Christ himself "brought life and immortality to light," and revealed to men the future world with its rewards and punishments.

RESULTS OF FOOD

Health and Natural Conditions Come from Right Feeding

Man, physically, should be like a perfectly regulated machine, each part working easily in its appropriate place. A slight derangement causes undue friction and wear, and frequently ruins the entire system.

A well-known educator of Boston found a way to keep the brain and the body in that harmonious co-operation which makes a joy of living.

"Two years ago," she writes, "being in a condition of nervous exhaustion, I resigned my position as teacher, which I had held for over 40 years. Since then the entire rest has, of course, been a benefit, but the use of Grape-Nuts has removed one great cause of illness in the past, namely, constipation and its attendant evils.

"I generally make my entire breakfast on a raw egg beaten into four spoonfuls of Grape-Nuts, with a little hot milk or hot water added. I like it extremely, my food assimilates, and my bowels take care of themselves. I find my brain power and physical endurance much greater and I know that the use of the Grape-Nuts has contributed largely to this result.

"It is with feelings of gratitude that I write this testimonial, and trust it may be the means of aiding others in their search for health." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Acquainting Men with God*

UNSYMPATHETIC critics not infrequently claim that our ministers preach almost anything else than the Gospel. They give us fine literary and historical essays; dissertations on philanthropy and politics; stories of heroism and of adventure; tucking in a neat moral, perhaps, at the end of each. But "they do not preach Christ's Gospel."

This is too sweeping. It is unjust—and yet there is enough truth in it to make the saying cut.

When Dr. Joseph Parker began to study the great congregation of the London City Temple, he found few laboring men in it.

"We must get them," he said to himself. "But how shall it be done?"

At last, he devised the plan of inviting some of them to a luncheon in the church. He said, "Bring your dinner-buckets and your pipes if you want to. I wish to have a good talk with you."

Several hundred of them accepted his invitation. Then, stepping out in front of them, he said, "Men, why don't you come to church?"

One of their leaders arose and said, "The church isn't for the likes of us. It is for the rich and prosperous. You don't want us there. That's what's the matter with the church."

Then Dr. Parker said, "Men, what is the matter with Jesus of Nazareth?"

Instantly a workingman swung his cap and said, in the rude but honest language of the street, "He's all right!"

A thousand or more workingmen kept swinging their caps and saying, "He's all right! He's all right!"

The Carpenter, he who healed the poor along with the rich, who over and again said that he was sent to "the least of these," appealed to the hearts of these rough men, although they felt—shame to us that it should ever be so!—shut out from his Church.

It is easy to explain Christ to the world. Some of the newer religions are hard to comprehend. Christ's words are plain to the dullest. No simpler creed was ever preached—and yet his followers have failed too often to interpret it to the world.

We are his epistles. As his words are clear and simple, so should our words and conduct be.

It has been said of some men that their faces alone were sermons which preached love, good will and nobility of soul to to every one who saw them. Thus it was with the sainted Livingstone. The African savage could not understand his words, but his kind face awakened love and confidence.

In the same way, a workingman once said of Phillips Brooks, "When I see that man, it is easy to believe in God."

It is true of others that their words are rough and their outward appearance is not attractive, yet among them are many of God's truest and purest. A poet has spoken of "the ugly face of some beautiful soul." Scars and angles may mar its outward seeming, but the life may be angelic, and may win many to Christ.

Most of us have known abnormally humble people who think—or so profess—that their influence counts for nothing.

It is not so. Every one is an epistle to be read by his companions—and the reading has its effect. You little know who is watching you, and where your chance words may lead some one who hears them. Your very thought must be guarded and restrained, for it leaves its mark upon you, and the passerby will read it on your face or in your speech.

Will Give Her Mite Gladly

ATTICA, IND., January 16, 1911.

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD:

Surely the memorial proposed must have been a suggestion of Dr. Klopsch's own spirit. No other could make him so happy. I want to give my mite, my only regret being that it must be but a mite. MRS. E. DEMOTTE CASE.

Christian Herald Premiums

Life Work of Louis Klopsch. Hundreds of Christian Herald readers have written glowing words of praise for this beautifully made and handsomely bound book. It tells the story of the poor immigrant boy who came to this country to seek his fortune along with hundreds of other pioneers. As we follow him up and up the rungs of the ladder of fame, as we see him rise from a childhood of few pleasures to a foremost position as Captain of World Philanthropies, we are charmed and inspired almost beyond comprehension. We feel the thrill of his splendid courage and enthusiasm, and as we share in his campaigns, we geat glimpse of high ideals, far beyond the ken of sordid souls—ideals that glorify and ennoble life and make it well worth living. Read this great book and learn for yourself the secret of his splendidly successful career. 472 pages; large, clear type; bound in dark green and gold. Stephen, A Soldier of the Cross. The Story of Stephen is beautifully told. Mrs. Kingsley has taken the little known life of this lovable Bible character and built from it a story of unusual interest. It vibrates with human emotion from the first page to the last. As we read of the manly acts of Stephen, as we see him working diligently, yea, lovingly, among the poor and the weak and the oppressed, we really feel that we see him (so wonderful and realistic is Mrs. Kingsley's description), comforting, cheering and inspiring friend and foe alike. If you haven't read "Stephen," or if you know of some friend who could be cheered by reading it, by all means see that this offer is taken advantage of. It is a good sermon in story form. "Stephen," will be sent with the Christian Herald for one year, our 1911 Calendar, and a Photogravure of Louis Klopsch, all four for only $1.85.

"Rise, Lurid Stars"

RISE, lurid stars, woolly white no more:
Change, angry cloth—weft of the silver stars no more;
Orbs blushing scarlet—thirty-four stars, red as flame,
On the blue bunting this day we sew.

World, take good notice, silver stars have vanished;
Orbs now scarlet—mortal coals, all aglow.
Dots of molten iron, wakeful and ominous,
On the blue bunting henceforth appear.

WALT WHITMAN in The Century.

From a MS. collection of poems never before published.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST WILLIAM A. SUNDAY began meetings in Waterloo, Ia., on November 6, which continued six weeks. There were many conversions, and the good work is now being supplemented by extra services in many of the churches.

—ELBERT M. MOFFATT, late business secretary of the West Side Young Men's Christian Association, New York City, has sailed for India to become assistant national secretary of the associations in that country. He is a young man of much promise.

—EVANGELISTS BROMLEY AND MEYERS have recently closed a series of union tabernacle meetings at Dell Rapids, S. D. About 260 were forward, the majority of whom were men and young men. They ask the prayers of our readers for a victory in the union tabernacle meetings now going on at Milbank, S. D.

—MISSIONARY W. HAGQVIST, of the Scandinavian Alliance Mission, writes concerning the work of the mission in Northern China: "The outlook in our field seems to be very good indeed and we hope and pray that this new year will be one of great ingathering of souls. We have had the joy, in many of our stations, of seeing a number of heathen turning to the Lord Jesus Christ."

—MISS MARY V. KIRK, formerly a missionary in Brazil, died lately at Aiken, S. C., of a complication of diseases. She contracted leprosy in Brazil nineteen years ago while serving in that country as a missionary. The fact that she was a leper did not become known until two years ago. Notwithstanding attempts to seclude her, she never left her own home. She was greatly respected.

—PRESIDENT W. W. WHITE of the Bible Teachers' Training School, New York, will return to China next summer. Last season out there he had a most remarkable demonstration of the power of the open Bible to create an atmosphere in which people of all denominations and different shades of critical opinion were really one. He feels that this method should very seriously be taken into consideration by the commission appointed by the Episcopal Church to study ways and means of unity.

—A COMMITTEE of six was lately formed from among the members of the little Christian Endeavor Society of Roseville, Calif., to see the owners of every saloon, pool-room, confectionery store and moving picture show in town and request them to close their places of business for the hour between 6.30 and 7.30 on Sunday, December 25. During the hour of Christian Endeavor that night eighteen saloons, twelve pool rooms, three confectionery stores and two moving picture shows were closed. Roseville is a new railroad town of 3,500 inhabitants.

Answered Prayers

Mrs. B., Westwood, N. J., has been restored to health through prayer.

O. J. C., East Greenwich. "God raised up a sick friend in answer to prayer."

M. D., Pittsburg, Pa. "I was out of work, I prayed to God and found employment."

A. B. G., Salem. "I wish to acknowledge the goodness of God in answering prayer."

M. A. W., Indiana. "I have great faith in prayer. Through it God has restored me to health."

E. M. S., Broad Ave, Pa. "The good Father answered a prayer which gave me great joy. I wish to acknowledge it."

Mr. and Mrs. M. G. C., Rapp, Kan. "We have had so many prayers answered by God, who is our dear guide always."

EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I was very much interested in the letter printed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of last week in regard to a suitable memorial to the memory of Dr. Klopsch, and I am glad you have decided to submit the matter to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to decide.

I have always been an intense admirer of Dr. Klopsch. He was a rare man, a noble man, with a noble purpose, and the endowment of the Children's Paradise seems the most eminently fitting memorial that can be given to him. The amount of good done by such a memorial will be like the influence of his beautiful life, immeasurable.

People's Day at White House

party, wear in London in 1908). Mr. Taft is suave and happy and makes all welcome.

The Marine Band, which has had an unbroken existence more than a hundred years, is divided into two parts for the reception, so as not to tire the players too much. If one wants to know what playing by a band ought to be, let him hear this famous band. It is called "The President's Own," and plays at all functions where a band is needed at the White House. The Judges of the Supreme Court are here with their wives, members of the Cabinet, and Congressmen, too. His Excellency James Bryce, the British Ambassador, the German, the Japanese, the Chinese, the French, and the Italian Ambassadors, in fact, all the ministers sent by the leading nations to Washington, with their ladies, are at these functions.

Looking around you see dazzling uniforms, medals worn by men for whom death had no terror, distinguished judges, the Cabinet, ministers, ambassadors with their families all mingled together in these spacious and magnificent salons. These rooms open on a still longer room, adorned with the busts of the nation's illustrious dead. Here you see the china that was used by many of the first ladies of the White House. Here, too, are fine paintings of notable American women, who were supreme in the domestic realm. Here is a stately figure of Mrs. Hayes—a painting given by the women of the Christian Temperance Union to tell all who read that she did not serve wine. Here is a beautiful painting of Mrs. Roosevelt by Chartran, and one of Mrs. Polk given by the ladies of Tennessee. There is one face before which women stand in mute sympathy, admiration and love. It is Mrs. Benjamin Harrison. The Daughters of the American Revolution gave it.

The White House is much larger than it seems. The lower floor is not seen in photographs, nor are the top rooms. The offices of the President are very large, including rooms for conference, for committees, for assistants. In the press room, all the great newspapers on the continent and the great news agencies of the world are represented. An interesting body of men they are—bright as a flash, and well informed. On days when the President receives the people, these men write reports which the antiquarian in ages to come will dig out of oblivion for precedent. They write of the stately dignity of its East Room, 82 by 40 feet in size, of the Blue Room, in which more than twenty of the Presidents have received; of the great State Dining Room, and the Red Room, and of the wonderful decorations of many kinds, not forgetting the gifts sent by foreign nations, which are a treasury of histories in themselves.

In the White House everything has its time and place. This applies even to the plants. Those in the Executive offices are in pots, placed in celluloid baskets of wicker pattern and green lined. Every four or five weeks the plants are changed. They are taken to the green-houses, given a warm bath in the vapor house, and I am told it is very surprising to see how the plants revive and flourish, like a sickly child under the beneficent influence of a seaside holiday, with plenty of good food and fresh air.

Each time the President has a reception, some of the visitors recall the "good old days," and the ladies exchange memories of other times. Even Presidents recall the past and seem glad in the memories thereof.

President Taft is an ideal official host, genial, dignified, broad-minded and sympathetic, and his "People's Days" are remembered with pleasure by all who are so fortunate as to enjoy them.

SERENITY*

IT IS sometimes said that serenity cannot be acquired; that unless it is a natural endowment, one, if ever so afflicted, must always remain a victim to worry, nervousness and depression.

This is not true. All but a few exceptional persons, diseased or degenerate, may become calm and cheerful in outward manner, and may effectually subdue wild and turbulent thoughts and passions.

You remember that in one of Charles Dickens's wonderful stories, he pictures an excitable and undisciplined girl, known as "Tattycoram," who is continually flying into a passion.

Her wise foster parents were in the habit of saying to her when one of her outbursts was imminent, "Count twenty, Tattycoram." By the time she had counted twenty, she was comparatively calm. This rule has been found effective in other households, though sometimes it is better to count fifty or a hundred.

The parents who permit a passionate child to grow up, without making every effort to teach him the beauty of serenity and the necessity of self-control, are guilty of a wrong against the child himself and against society; for many of the most shocking crimes are committed by those who have been allowed to give free rein to their emotions. They go wild with anger, envy, jealousy or grief; work their crazy will while the spell is upon them; and then often come to themselves only to be filled with hopeless remorse for their misdeeds.

It is chiefly for the effect upon our own souls that we should cultivate this beautiful virtue. To be constantly worried, fearing, agitated, is degrading and debilitating to the whole nature.

As no great literature or great art was possible until men began to know personal safety and some degree of physical comfort; so no mind can have great thoughts, or can live in the higher realms of light and peace until it is free from that perpetual mood of anxiety, which blights and cankers.

Ruskin has remarked that he has noticed that all the people he meets are wanting something. They want liberty, they want amusement, they want money; "but which of us," he adds, "feels or knows that he wants peace?"

And yet there is nothing so beautiful as the vision of peace. Its beauty in thought is matched by the beauty of its reality. In the life in which peace abounds, there the best of God's gifts will be bestowed.

"How shall I acquire this precious possession?" one asks. "I have tried to will it. I have prayed for it, and yet my soul is filled with unrest and rebellion."

That devout saint, Fénelon, said that his rule was to desire only the will of God.

"Resign every forbidden joy; restrain every wish that is not referred to his will; banish all eager desires, all anxiety, and you will find peace."

One of our poets has said that he "takes great comfort in the thought of God." A mighty hand is on the helm, an all-seeing eye pierces the clouds ahead, a loving heart guides the wind-tossed bark. It is his will that not any should perish.

"Do not lose your inward peace for anything whatsoever, not if the whole world should be upset," said the consecrated St. Francis de Sale.

And the peace of the individual but typifies the beauty of the peace of a nation.

Latest Dictionary of the English Language

Dennison Thumb Index

A RELIABLE 1910 dictionary for convenient, quick use in the office, the home, or the school, is the Funk & Wagnalls Comprehensive Standard. It has been abridged from the famous Funk & Wagnalls Standard Dictionary of the English Language.

The Comprehensive Standard defines over 38,000 words and phrases in common use among the English-speaking peoples, with more than 800 instructive pictorial illustrations, scientifically accurate and artistically exact, which were made especially for this work. It is a most up-to-date and handy volume, and for the ordinary needs of the average person it is without a peer.

Edited by JAMES C. FERNALD, L.H.D.

The high standing of the Editor, James Champlin Fernald, L.H.D., is a sufficient guaranty for the accuracy, comprehensiveness and general excellence of the work. In his treatment the Editor has kept constantly in mind the necessity of giving in the simplest form the Orthography, Pronunciation, Definition and Derivation of all words that are not self-defining.

1.—The Vocabulary
Its vocabulary will be found exceptionally comprehensive and exact.

2.—Orthography
In orthography it is conservative; but when two ways of spelling the same word are sanctioned by usage, the two forms have been recorded, and preference has been given usually to the simpler form. In general, the spelling will be found to conform to the decision of the Standard Dictionary Committee of fifty leading Philologists and Educators.

3.—Capitalization
Only such words as should be written with capital initial letters are capitalized in the vocabulary, thus enabling any person using the work to see at a glance how to write the word.

4.—Pronunciation
The Standard Scientific Alphabet has been used to indicate the pronunciation of all words. This alphabet was prepared and promulgated by the American Philological Association, and indicating as it does with a minuteness and accuracy unattained by all other systems for conveying sounds, it is the simplest aid to exact pronunciation yet devised.

5.—The Definitions
Special care has been taken to make the definitions as comprehensive as possible by embracing recent meanings and distinctions, and by making the general definitions thoroughly inclusive. The most common meaning has been placed first, the others following in the order of their divergence. The aim has been to secure simplicity of expression, conciseness of statement, brevity and clearness. Where definition by synonym is employed, scrupulous care has been taken to define the unfamiliar by the familiar word, or by a word which is itself more fully defined in its own place.

6.—Compounding
The German double hyphen is used to distinguish hyphenated compound words from compounds in which the words originally distinct are united without the hyphen.

7.—Etymologies
The etymologies have been given in a clear form, tracing each word as far as practicable to its ultimate source, that the reader may know how the word originated, and how it came to have its present signification. The introduction of etymologies is a wholly new feature not found in any other dictionaries of this scope and design.

The Greatest Business Runabout Made

New Price, $600 Equipped As Shown

1243 Firms Use Maxwells

The experience of the United Drug Company of Boston recited above is merely a case in point. 1242 other firms find Maxwells a paying investment. Some use as many as 25 machines. Nearly all started with one car, on trial. 104 of this model were sold recently—divided between the largest watch, electrical, yeast, and powder companies in the United States. These companies abandoned use of the train and horse and buggy, because the train only touched the bigger cities, and the horse could not stand the strain. 700-mile trips are perilous to the horse, expensive by train, but incidental to the automobile.

The Maxwell Pays For Itself

IF USED, the above model pays for itself in less than three months in increased earnings and savings—is an incentive to the salesman to do more work—brings him in touch with more customers and oftener. He works longer because his work is half play. In short, it produces results where there were none before, as its growing use among merchants easily proves.

The Maxwell business runabout annihilates distance and is ready in a jiffy, with no time lost for feeding. Its speed enables it to travel almost as fast as the train travels from place to place—since it need not stop en route—while it saves a vast amount of time which now is lost waiting for train time or in making connections. There is no need to cut short an important interview because of the approaching hour of departure. All this means increased sales.

The Greatest Business Runabout

WE HAVE called this car "the greatest runabout," and it really is. In point of number used, it leads—in achievement, stands first—holds hundreds of records for endurance, road events and hill climbs. Holds world's non-stop record—3500 miles. One-tenth of the physicians in the United States drive Maxwell runabouts. 4225 farmers employ them on the farm, and in sales to business houses we are supreme. With its staunch and sturdy lines, it is not to be compared with any of the new, low-priced, quickly-assembled cars offered to the public today. Uniform in construction, of first-class material, this runabout guarantees years of constant service, day after day, 365 days in the year. If it did not, we would never have amassed the record of sales to the above number of discriminating buyers, who absolutely demand constant and economic service in the business.

These Books Free: We tell the commercial side of the Runabout in facts and figures in a book entitled "The Maxwell in Business." Every merchant should read it. With it we send "How to Judge an Automobile," a practical treatise on motor cars in general, and our new catalogue just off the press. All worth reading and yours for the asking. Write today. A postal will do. Just say, "Mail Books."

$10,000 MORE FOR CHINA FAMINE RELIEF

Christian America's Sympathy Aroused in Behalf of the People Now Afflicted by the Double Scourge of Plague and Starvation

CHINA'S double battle with the pneumonia plague in her northern provinces, and with famine in the territory along the Grand Canal, is approaching a serious crisis. While famine is slaying its thousands in Anhui and Kiang-su, a deadly plague is rolling up an appalling list of victims in Manchuria and threatens to sweep the coast line territory to the south. Peking, the capital, has been almost deserted by foreigners and even the Chinese officials are making ready for flight through fear of the "Black Death."

In the city of Harbin, the epidemic has spread to such an extent that the authorities are burning the dead to lessen the danger of infection. In one day, 2,000 coffins, containing plague victims, were burned. An attempt was made to dig gigantic trenches; but this was found impracticable as the ground was hard frozen. In Mukden, out of 151 cases, ninety-two died within twenty-four hours. Such is the virulence of the disease that a very small proportion of the victims recover.

Dr. J. Chabaneix, of the Imperial Medical College of Tientsin, states that the plague is wholly of the pneumonic type and intensely virulent. "Plague bacilli are transmitted by actual contact, either by particles carried through the air, or by handling the patients. He added: "There have been no authenticated recoveries." Serum has been used, but the results are not satisfactory. The government is making strenuous efforts to prevent the spread of the plague, which is admitted to be one of the most deadly in the world's history, and one against which science is apparently unavailing.

Several American missionary physicians are now on the way to localities that lie in the path of the plague. The Chinese people themselves are accepting the situation with something like indifference; but the authorities are using every means to localize the plague. All infected houses are burned; suspects are isolated; rewards are paid for bringing in dead rats, and filthy sections are cleansed and fumigated.

Burning Plague Victims in Manchuria

Dr. A. P. Peck, an American physician in the Chinese service, says the bacilli enter the lungs in breathing. He thinks rats and serum are no factors in infection. Cold weather is favorable to the spread of the epidemic. Japanese doctors call it a "lung plague," pure and simple, and with a bacillus identical with that of the bubonic plague. They are pessimistic concerning the outlook. Superior hygiene, however, gives comparative immunity. There is an evident conflict of opinion among the doctors regarding the diagnosis of the disease; but all agree that it is acutely contagious. All European countries are taking protective measures, and our own government is leaving nothing undone to prevent the transmission of infection to this country.

News from the famine districts is not encouraging. Chairman Longden of the Missionary Committee at Chinkiang, on February 1, cabled to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"Without help, millions must perish. Dead, starved, frozen, now seen daily. Snow increases suffering.

"LONGDEN."

The food purchased with our two remittances, sent some time ago, has been promptly distributed through both the Relief Committees, as both are co-operating in the field. There cannot be any diminution in the suffering for weeks to come. A third remittance of $10,000 has been cabled by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through our State Department in Washington, and before this reaches the eyes of our readers, this large gift

The War of Good and Evil Forces

TEXT—Job 1:9

THE opening chapters of the book of Job furnish us with the lesson of the hour. It is almost needless to say that this is a very wonderful book—wonderful in its poetic passion; wonderful in its grasp upon and interpretation of the deep impulses, motives and powers of human nature; still more wonderful in its view of God and his government of men; and most wonderful of all in that large, reconciling conception of human life which makes it possible for those who understand to live in the midst of the contradictions and darkness of this world bravely, gladly, faithfully, facing the end without fear, and trusting always in God.

The appearance of the devil in heaven is in itself a notion—apart from any consideration as to its being a fact—of such audacity, such remarkable originality, such penetration of concept as to distinguish this drama from all other writings in the world. The devil is pictured as appearing at the council table of God. He seems to be well known in heaven, showing that he and his works constitute a recognized part of the moral machinery of the universe.

The Force of Evil Suggestion

Nowadays we think we have dismissed the devil from our life conceptions. It has not made any improvement in the world that I can see. Men are just as sinful as they were before we got rid of the devil. They suffer just as much, and malign suggestions to evil come from somewhere to all men, just as they always have. I am not going to argue for the existence of the devil. I would much rather try to argue him out of existence if it were possible. I wish I could believe he did not exist; but there are so many things in life, so many disappointments in one's own nature, so many subtle, unexpected, intangible yet intelligible happenings that can hardly be explained, except by reference to a malign spirit, that I am old-fashioned enough to think there is somebody—call him by any name you please—interfering with, and spoiling the works of God and men.

I used to know a delightful crank—one among many—who had as his motto: "I suggest suggestion." He illustrated in his own person how deadly dangerous it is to be possessed with one idea. A man might as well be possessed with the devil as to be possessed with one idea, even though that idea be a good one; because this world is so complex, and ideas are so interlaced one with the other, that unless you can see more than one spot in the picture, you might as well be blind; unless you can hear more than one accent in the voice of God, you do not hear the voice of God at all; unless you have room in your nature for more than one truth, you have not any truth at all. This brother suggested suggestion as the explanation of all phenomena, mental, moral, physical, divine, human, eternal and temporal. I could not go that far with him; but I am convinced that there is present in the spiritual history of men and women to-day a suggesting agent, or a force of evil suggestion, that is not of men.

Alienating the People from God

Take New York, or any other city, on the Lord's Day. Four and a half millions of people around us, representing the upward struggle of the human race through all the centuries—the very best that the German race could produce; the Italian race; the French race; the Jewish race; the various breeds of Gentiles, and above all, the Americans. We are the best there is anywhere, which is not saying much. Now, in this great city to-day, with its uncounted millions, there is a notion in the minds of great and small that material things are real things; that therefore they ought to command and hold the whole personality of the man, and that this psalm-singing and praying and congregating together on a certain day, named Sunday, is an entirely secondary thing. They have a notion of religion so absurd, so cramped, so local and narrow and individual and separate from any large sweep of thought and feeling, that one is amazed to see any man in this advanced civilization become so feeble and futile throughout the highest and most glorious part of his nature.

What produces this?

I believe it is the product of the devil.

"The soul that sinnèth, it shall die," says God.

And the devil says: "Thou shalt not surely die."

"The soul that sinneth it shall die," says God, as he stands at the threshold of the palace; and the young millionaire with his education, his exalted position and his vast resources, looks past God and hears a voice saying to him: "Thou shalt not surely die," and straightway goes out and becomes a fool. The poor man in the street, with his heart hungry for something, he knows not what, following his human instincts, would find his way to the foot of Christ, but somebody tells him that in politics he is a republican, in economics a socialist, and in religion an atheist. Straightway he thinks he hears a real voice saying to him: "There is no God." Thus do multitudes become godless. That lying suggestion slips into our homes and we cease to teach our children the Word of God. No longer do we teach them the eternal difference between right and wrong, and the holy Commandments of the Holy God. No longer do we pray and strive that our children shall become followers of Jesus. We imitate the godless multitude and seek to make our children like the world in dress, in habits of speech, in conceptions and ideals and methods and deeds.

Where does all this come from? Who has led American Christians to believe it more important that they and their children should understand the ways of polite society, than that they should be right with God? These are the facts. I believe that they come from beneath. The same suggestion that Satan put into the minds of our first parents he is to-day breathing into the willing hearts of men everywhere. That is why men drift away from the church. The devil suggests to them that they had better stay home from prayer meeting and go to the theatre, and they do it; that they had better taste at least one draught from the cup of this world, and they do it. Once they have given themselves over to that suggestion they become with incredible and appalling swiftness alienated from God.

The Cynicism of Satan

Now, when the devil tried this on God, it was different from trying it on man. True to his own nature, the cynicism of Satan is one of the most marvelous spectacles in the universe. He seems to be absolutely without faith in God, as he is without faith in man. When he appeared in the councils of heaven, and God asked him what he had been doing, he replied that he had just been attending to business, running up and down. God asked him if he had not noticed Job, and Satan said: "Yes, I have seen Job. But cut down his dividends, and see how good a believer Job will be. Does Job serve God for naught?" If the devil's suggestion at that point is universally true, your life and mine becomes the blankest absurdity and disappointment that even the devil could conceive. The moment you admit that there is nothing in this world of disinterested goodness, you make this world the creation of some devil. It belongs to him, and is going to him as fast as possible. After the devil had his way with Job's property, and had been proven a liar, he said: "All that a man hath will he give for his life. Put his life in my hands, and I'll show you."

Young men and women, you are just beginning your career. Some of us who are older and have learned in the bitter school of experience, do not, perhaps, need this teaching; but it may save you much if you accept this thought: When the devil tells you that no man will serve God except for the gain that is in it for him, believe that he is telling a lie of infinite depth and blackness. If you want evidence other than the word of God itself, look about you. Does no one do anything except for what he can get out of it? To-night at midnight in this city the telephone of a physician will ring. A little child is sick down there in the alley, in some little slum lodging place, and this great physician, who has a prominent position, and receives large pay when he goes to wait upon those who have the means to pay him, will get up from his bed and go out into the deserted streets; he will climb those filthy, reeking, creaking stairs and sit beside that babe till morning, and half of to-morrow, if it be necessary, ministering to that poor little child with his large skill and fidelity, as if he were to receive a thousand dollars at the end of his call. There are scores of physicians in this city and thousands in the civilized world doing just this every day. Following the physician into the home, is the nurse. There are men who are in the medical profession simply and solely for the money; but they are not the best physicians. There are nurses that are hirelings; but no physician will have them twice. There may be preachers who are in the ministry for money; but the true minister of Jesus gives daily that which no money can measure or buy.

What Sincere, Loving Service Means

Your mother, who sat by you week in and week out, when you had that desperate illness as a child, did she do it for what there was in it for her? Your wife, who swore solemnly at the altar to take you for better or worse, when your fortune left you, and you went down into poverty, and she went with you, did she do it for what there was in it for her? Did she not do it for you, and to keep her plighted troth? You, when you swore to your own hurt, as men do sometimes, was it for what there was in it for you? When, because you believed in the right, you refused to become a party to a crooked transaction that would have brought money into your coffers, did you do that because of what there was in it for you? I refuse to believe the devil's cynicism, that the love of money is one controlling and prevailing motive in all activities of men. It is prominent and powerful; and selfishness, enlightened and unenlightened, is one of the most profound motives of human nature; but I refuse to believe that the devil told the truth when he suggested that Job—and all the rest of the world, therefore—was serving God for gain.

Nor will men give everything they have in the world for their lives. I have a friend, a very great surgeon, one of the greatest. A telegram came to him that a poor old woman up in the country was stricken with a terrible case of blood poisoning. He took the train and went up to that cottage. He performed a major operation without any appliances such as he would have liked to have around him, and without assistance. In that operation he became himself infected with the poison from the wound; came back to the city and lay there at the point of death. Do you mean to tell me that that man took that risk for what there was in it for him? He was infected because of a certain wound upon his hand that he could not adequately protect by any appliance he then had, yet he performed that operation and faced death in so doing!

Life Is an Eternity—Not a Day

His neighbor, another physician, had a serious affection of the heart. His brother physicians were called in, and as he lay dying, he dictated to a stenographer his symptoms, so that other men would in the future know how to deal with that peculiar malady. According to the devil, that man ought to have been pleading with those doctors to save his life. But he was thinking of other lives. Think of the soldiers who have proved the devil to be a liar when he said: "All that a man hath will he give for his life." The unmarked graves of countless battlefields prove that there are many things for which a man will give his life. Some of us have children. Is there a mother or father here who, if it were necessary, would not die for their children? Life is precious, but manhood and womanhood and honor and self-respect and freedom and love are infinitely more precious. The devil lied! He always does, and always will, and the pity of it is that we believe his lies so often.

Now, I must call your attention to two great teachings of this passage. The first is that in the case of Job we have illustrated the idea that goodness is supposed to be followed by happiness, and badness by unhappiness. In Job's case goodness was followed by unhappiness.

Our answer is this: Taken now, in any given day, it seems true that good men are often unhappy and bad men often very happy. But life is not one day. Life is an eternity: and taken in the large, as it is done in the first Psalm, it is true that goodness eventuates in rejoicing and badness in sorrow.

Another teaching is that unbought
ve is the test of all moral issues.
od loves us, not for what we can do or him, or give him; he loves us be-use he himself is love. It is un-ought. He loves the sinner. I believe at at one time, he loved the Devil, id was exceedingly sorry to see him ill from his high estate in the coun-ls of eternity. God loves you and me, though we may have never given him thought in our life. He loves us hen we are good; he loves us when e are bad; he loves us when we suc-ed and when we fail, not because of ese accidents in our experience, but cause he is our Father; because God love, and he is true to his own na-
re. Now, we love God for exactly e same reason. "Thou shalt love the ord thy God with all thy heart, and ith all thy soul, and with all thy mind, id with all thy strength, and thy eighbor as thyself" is the command.
o man, apparently, can be comanded into loving; yet that is the ry essence and test of moral exist-
ce. Life is not ideas or opinions.
is love! You might as well thrust farthing candle against the noonday n, as to put your little argumenta-ons against eternal truth for their umination.

There is only one thing that makes y difference between us and other en. That is, do we love? I do not ean those who love us, for even the iblicans do that. But do we love as od loves—with an unbought love?
o we love men who fail and are weak, t because they fail and are weak, but cause we are like God? We love, cause he loved us. Do we love?
hat is the question.

O love, that wilt not let me go,
I rest my weary soul in thee.

his unbought love is the test of all oral nature. The devil cannot under-and this, because he is a cynic, and lieves that nothing is done except for ofit.

And now, as you go out to your work id to your home, do not forget that ere is another universe all around u which is affecting your life. "No an cares for my soul!" is the cry of ousands in these terrible cities. But is not true. Back of the screen the st forces of the spiritual universe e concentrating upon each soul. The sues of your life are decided on the her side, not on this. Trust your life
God. If the day is dark and you e sinking down into weakness—"The ord gave, and the Lord hath taken way. Blessed be the name of the ord!" Trust him, and believe that loves you; that he is caring for you; id that his forces and resources are your command. Thus will you be ted to live in this world, and you will sure to live in the world which is to me.

Our Father, help us to believe in ine unbought love. Help us to be-ve that it is possible for men to be selfish in the glorified, renewed Spirit Christ. Help us to believe in good-ss, and not be cynics and sour critics men and of the world and of God.
elp us to flee from the devil and all s works, because he is the father of s, and the life that is built upon a lie ust crumble into ruin. Help us to rn to thee, and plunge our spirits to the vast ocean of thy unbought
ve, and then come back to our life d to our task, and be known as the

By Rev. J. M. FARRAR, D.D.*

ARE you thankful that your nose is just where it is? Never thought of that? Just try to imagine it some other place on your face. We should be thankful that our nose is in the right place. It holds our spectacles and is therefore a friend of our eyes. Gold, silver, nickel, iron, steel; which metal binds your eye-windows together and holds them across your nose? Yours are steel? Just the same as mine. We must be careful when standing close to a powerful magnet. Why? The magnet might draw our steel-rimmed spectacles off our nose.

There are many magnets and we pass close to some of them every day. "When I was a boy," said an old man, "I was often very idle, and used to play during the lessons with other boys as idle as myself. One day we were fairly caught by the master. 'Boys,' he said, 'you must not be idle; you must attend closely to your books. The first one of you who sees another boy idle will please come and tell me.'

"'AH,' I thought to myself, 'there is Joe Simmons, that I don't like; I'll catch him, and if I see him look off his book I'll tell the teacher.'

"It was not long until I saw Joe look off his book, and I went up at once to tell the master.

"'Indeed,' he said; 'how did you know he was idle?'

"'I saw him,' said I.

"'You did? And were your eyes on your book when you saw him?' said the teacher. 'Probably those steel spectacles you wear are to blame. Mischief is a magnet, and it may have drawn your eyes and nose into what was not your own business.' When I went home I asked father to get me gold-rimmed spectacles. When I told father why I wanted gold instead of iron he laughed a great long laugh. Said he had the same trouble when he was a boy. One day he saw two boys stealing a sled and something just drew him over to see the sled. The bad boys broke his glasses, hurt his nose and stole his hat."

LET us put on our thinking caps. Might there be something they call sin in our hearts, something like bits of steel? If so, then there may be magnets of temptation that draw these sins and with them draw us into bad company. Something like steel-rimmed spectacles on our soul.

My uncle works in a mill, and one day a piece of steel was thrown from a wheel and sank deep into his eye. The doctor had a magnet and with it drew the piece of steel out of his eye. He told uncle that his magnet would lift four hundred pounds. It would surely draw a steel splinter out of any part of the body. I wonder if there is any magnet strong enough to draw sin out of the heart.

MOTHER heard me laughing about steel-rimmed spectacles on my heart, and she said there is a magnet called the Cross, that can draw them off. Our text says: "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." When Christ died for us he was lifted up on the cross. That may be what mother meant when she said the Cross was a magnet.

When we go home we will ask father or mother who the great Magnet is who can draw us from any part of the world to him. If he can draw us to him, then he will surely be able to draw steal, and all kinds of sin, out of our hearts.

Now two minutes for a story:

It is about a mariner's compass. In it is a magnetic needle pointing to the north. If there is a steel wire or nail near it the needle will not point right. Once a sailor drove a nail near the ship's compass and the nail caused the needle to turn from the north. The captain thought the needle was pointing right, but it misled him, and his ship was wrecked on the rocks.

A VERY learned man decided to study the magnetic needle and try to make it always point to the north. For several weeks he sat and bent over the needle, but the closer he watched it the farther it would move from the north. He tried more than a dozen needles and decided they were all wrong. The needles were right, his brain was right, his nose was all right, and his figures were correct. What was wrong? On his nose he wore steel-bound spectacles.

Now listen to the best kind of a secret, a secret you can tell. Sin is a magnet and draws us away from God. Love is a better magnet and draws us to God. The Cross represents love, and so long as we keep close to the Cross sin cannot draw us away.

When the woes of life o'ertake me,
Hopes deceive, and fears annoy,
Never shall the Cross forsake me;
Lo! it glows with peace and joy.

The Stolen Princess

IN a recent letter from China, Miss Alice Whittier, a missionary, relates this touching incident: Ning Yuen Fu, where her letter is dated, is in West China, near the Tibetan border. The Lolos are one of the wild native tribes who have been displaced by the Chinese in part. Miss Whittier writes:

"Two days ago, a beautiful young Lolo woman came with her servant to these white missionaries to beg help against a high official of Ning Yuen Fu. She is the widowed queen of a Lolo chieftain. This Chinese ruler, she alleged, had stolen, since her husband's death, large quantities of stuff from her, and he holds her little seven-year-old girl as a slave! 'But we are only Lolos,' she added, 'and without redress.' I don't know when anything has appealed to me so. One would like to be a whole army and the United States Government at once to set these things straight. But we are just three white people, hundreds of miles from help, and the 'Fu' (Chinese ruler) can cut the Lolos' heads off—the child's and woman's—if he wishes and little if anything would ever be done about it.

"We had not finished morning worship November 8, when a little black-haired tot of seven (she looks only five) with wide, scared eyes full of tears, but mouth tensely shut in pitiful control, was led to the front steps by an excited man. He was clad in the usual blue Chinese clothes, his head bound round in limitless lengths of cloth, and his face long, sensitive, and full of intelligence.

"The child dropped down on the stones and bumped her head to us collectively and severally; the man proceeded to follow her example, in spite of our protests. The school teachers came up and we were soon all a little excited, for the child was no other than the little Lolo princess. Not much of a princess did she look, to be sure, in loose and dirty blue trousers, and with her head uncared for; but something in her self-control and her bright eyes marked her as no coolie child.

"'She had been sent out,' so said the man, 'to buy paper on the street, and seeing me ran to me crying.'

"The inwardness of that meeting seems a bit uncertain, for the man, who is part Lolo, is in Mr. Rudd's class and sleeps behind the chapel. The child's old nurse appeared from somewhere and a happy meeting took place. By the advice of a conclave of friends, Mr. Rudd (an American Baptist missionary) sent a very polite message to the 'Fu' that his little 'hostage' was in our compound, but we had taken a liking to the child, and would take good care of her if he wished her to attend our girls' school. Our most diplomatic and well liked evangelist took the letter. We waited!

"Back came our messenger presently, and with him a tall and whiskered dignitary (next in rank to the 'Fu'); very polite he was; thanked Mr. Rudd, looked about the compound and even sat a while in the Bible class. Then he went away, a coolie carrying the little princess, Tien Tsong ('canopy of heaven') in his arms! The little thing kept back her tears till they went away with her; then they overflowed, as did her temper; she pounded that coolie with both little fists and wept!

"We could not restrain our tears after the dignitary was out of sight. Our hearts were sore and sad within us, especially the next day, when we heard that the poor little princess got a whipping after she was taken back.

"Sunday afternoon, as I was with a Chinese lady visitor, Mrs. Rudd came in, leading a little girl. I did not know her till her big black eyes rolled up toward me. It was the 'Fousah's' (chieftain's) little girl, back again—the Princess Tien Tsong! The 'Fu' had sent her back with payment for a month's tuition and board."

OUR NEW CENTRE OF POPULATION

Townfolks of Nashville, Ind.

A Quiet Scene

Young Folks of the New Centre

IF YOU were an enterprising foreign tourist in the United States of America, and resolved to get at the very heart of American life while on this side the pond, you might, reckoning on sound principles of economics, look up the centre of population, and hie yourself thither. When you would arrive at Nashville, Ind., which Census Director Durand has pronounced the new centre of population, you would find the heart of American life so primitive, at such a standstill, that in the entire county you would not find a single railway. That, however, would be only one side of the story. Another would lie in the fact that the very core of American life there consists of a number of happy-go-lucky artists and summer sketchers, who have no more to do than to transfer to canvas pictures of unending, dusty turnpikes, quiet pools, farmers' boys with broad-brimmed hats, and the farmers themselves, keen and shrewd, who rent out attic bedrooms to these artists for ten times what the space is worth. In this circumstance, at least, the visitor will get a taste of the world-renowned American business acumen.

Nashville, Ind., newly come to fame, is renowned as the American Ecounen, the happy hunting-ground of the artist. In fact, one who knows the region best tells us it is a landscape painter's paradise. "Little wonder," he relates, "that they named the chain of knobs extending through this South Indiana country the 'Silver Hills.' Bayard Taylor dubbed it the Switzerland of America, and others have likened it to the rural districts of England and of Scotland. The country round about is diversified. There are quiet, rippling streams over beds of pink shelving slate, overhanging green boughs and patches of blue sky, with majestic valleys set between dignified hills that run for miles and miles. The vistas range from rich emerald to turquoise and amethyst. One lovely ridge rises above another, over green lowlands, where the cattle peacefully browse. Through the valley winds Silver Creek, in quiet beauty, separating Floyd County from Clark. Beyond the hills you'll find Indian Creek, flowing into another region of splendid views. It is difficult for an artist to select a spot where all are equally lovely. Indian Creek is worth following from source to mouth. It bespeaks calm and peace and content, as it meanders through the woods and meadows and farms. Sometimes it gets so sluggish that it seems not to flow at all, its waters appearing to sleep in quiet pools that mirror the blue vault above. Certainly this creek with the adjacent views—corners of the farmlands, the country roads, the knolls with their red barns, the groups of trees, the tiny cascades in the hills—all form irresistible subjects for the artist's brush. Sometimes one will come on walls, water-worn and filled with vegetation, down along the banks of the creek, which are worthy of copying; at other times hay-ricks, corn-shocks and other addenda of the farm will delight the artistic eye as forming suitable foreground to the deep blue sky.

"In many places magnificent views can be had of the hill-tops stretching away to neighboring cities and towns, which appear smoke-enclosed and of miniature size, when thus seen in the distance. Farther off, villages look as if huddled together, having a gray aspect, and here and there a white glistening spire, cutting the sky-line, or a bridge with spans looking like cobwebs. At close surroundings the old-time gardens, decked in myriad colors, bask in the sunlight and look like jewels of Byzantium."

Such is an artist's impressions of the locality now reckoned the heart of the American Republic. What more need be said? Nashville is a typical Indiana country town, on a typical Indiana countryside, and forms an interesting commentary on the greatest industrial nation on earth.

will have been converted into food for the famishing. Our appeal to the benevolence and generosity of American hearts is meeting with a loyal response on every side. All contributions are cabled to the Relief Committees and it is hoped that a remittance can be made weekly until the crisis is past.

His Excellency Chang Yin-Tang, Chinese Minister in Washington, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that the Viceroy at Nanking cables news of distressing conditions among the population of the Hwei-Ho Valley. The government has remitted all taxes and has given a generous grant from the imperial treasury, but very little headway has yet been made in alleviating the situation. The committee appointed by the Viceroy in conjunction with the Governor of Anhui, with headquarters at Shanghai, is dealing with the situation and making appeals to both Chinese and foreigners. The Viceroy hopes that the American people and the Chinese residents in the United States will aid in relieving the present distress.

We trust that all of our readers, who have not yet contributed, will send in their gifts quickly. China in her deep distress appeals to us more strongly than at any previous time, and deserves our sympathy and our material help. Our mission aries and their associates are risking their live daily in the struggle in which they are now engaged Let us hold up their hands and give them the neces sary means to continue the fight until, in God's goo providence, the worst is fairly over. China's death roll from the twin affliction will be a frightful on this year. If we, by any means in our power, ca be instrumental in lessening it, even to the extent o saving a single life, now is the time to exert our selves. A gift, consecrated by prayer and sen quickly, will have God's blessing added to it, an will not fail to produce its effect.

Appalling Dynamite Explosion

ONE of the most frightful accidents the Eastern seaboard has experienced in many years occurred at the noon hour on February 1 at the Communipaw terminal of the Central Railroad of New Jersey, directly across the Hudson River from the lower section of Manhattan. A carload of dynamite and gelatine, thirty-five tons in all, in transit from a railway car to a lighter waiting at the pier, suddenly exploded, scattering death and destruction for many miles around both on river and land. The air became black with smoke and débris of all kinds. Planks, masts, spars, brick and iron were hurled skyward, as if belched forth from the crater of a volcano. Here and there, clinging to pieces of the flying wreckage, were fragments of human bodies, which had been torn from the unfortunate victims caught within the radius of the explosion. The shock affected a district of over fifty miles in diameter, being distinctly felt in Long Island towns. There was almost a panic in New York. The streets were thronged with employees of the big office buildings, and for a considerable time no one knew what had happened, or the location of the disaster. Fire alarms were turned in from several stations, and ambulances came clanging their gongs, scattering pedestrians, and adding to the confusion. The doctors had enough to do rushing to the hospitals the victims cut by flying glass from the shaking skycrapers and other tall buildings in the lower part of the city. Many thought that an earthquake had occurred and rushed into the streets.

The streets were strewn with glass, windows having been blown out by the thousands. Scarcely a building was left with all its windows intact for an area of more than fifty square blocks.

When finally it was discovered that an explosion on the Jersey side of the river had caused the terrible shock and destruction, ambulances from nearly all the city hospitals were rushed across to render assistance. The result of the explosion is almost impossible to describe. The immediate surroundings looked as if some powerful seismic convulsion had ripped up the earth and twisted and contorted the work of human hands. The pier was no more. The planking was ground into fragments and the freight cars were masses of splintered wood and iron. The glass roof collapsed on the train shed of the Jersey Central terminal, showering passengers with broken fragments. One man was so severely cut that he died afterwards in the hospital. Inside the station damage was visible everywhere. The floors were littered with glass and the casings of the windows had been snapped from their frames. The hands of the big clock on the ferry house were torn off and the front wall of the building was bulged out as though it had been made of cardboard.

The exact cause of the explosion will probably never be known, for no one who was in the immediate vicinity lives to tell the tale. Over thirty lives were snuffed out in this sudden disaster. Of those injured, maimed or disfigured the number will probably reach five hundred, and of these many will die of their wounds.

The dynamite had been shipped from the DuPont Powder Company, and was being transported to Hudson River points for the purpose of blasting on the Palisades.

On the far end of the pier a crew of repairers engaged by the railway company had been at work. When the noon hour struck about a score of men sat down on the pier to eat luncheon. Almost immediately came the awful detonation that blew them to fragments. Two lighters with their crews and those on the pier were wiped out, as if some miraculous hand had annihilated them. The schooners were dismantled and their crews badly shaken and injured. The windows of river craft within a radius of a mile from the explosion were shattered and the ferryboats became as floating hospitals, caring for those wounded by the glass. The side of one of the Jersey Central ferryboats was crushed like an eggshell.

There was wild excitement in the immigrant depot on Ellis Island. Every window was shattered. Six hundred aliens were in a state of abject terror. Frenzied scenes were enacted in some of the great business buildings. Stampedes were made for the elevators and the stairs. Every exit was jammed with surging crowds battling to get to the street. The great Singer Building rocked like a storm-tossed ship. In Jersey City the shock was so intense that it is impossible to estimate the damage. In fact it will require months to total up the material losses occasioned by the catastrophe.

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—A CHOLERA EPIDEMIC is again spreading over southern Italy. Many virulent cases are reported from the cities and towns. Palermo in Sicily is badly affected. Americans are being warned to keep away, and as expositions are to be held at Turin and Rome this summer the promoters are beginning to feel alarmed for their success. It is said that the Italian government is doing little to stamp out the malady.

—IT IS PROBABLE that at an early date there will be legislation authorizing the issuance of Panama Canal bonds. Some time ago a bill was introduced restraining the Secretary of the Treasury from accepting Panama Canal bonds issued up to a certain limit as a basis for national bank circulation. This bill also limited the amount of bonds which the Secretary could issue to $100,000,000. The new bill will not restrict the amount of issue.

—A BILL HAS been introduced into the United States Senate, with the approval of the National Immigration Committee, which, if it becomes a law, will hedge around with drastic restrictions the admission of aliens into New York and other ports of the country. The steamship companies and ships' officers are responsible for bringing in many undesirable aliens. The new measure prescribes heavy penalties for landing such persons unlawfully.

—THE APPOINTMENT of the Duke of Connaught as Governor-General of Canada has been officially announced. The Duchess will accompany him to Government House, Rideau Hall, early in September. The Duke is the youngest brother of the late King Edward. It is believed his appointment is a stroke of royal statesmanship, designed to counteract the effects of the commercial approximation of the Dominion and the United States and to remedy some of the mischief wrought by fiscal perversity.

—SOME OF THE leading foreign physicians in China and Manchuria hold that the plague now raging there may have originated with the large rat-like prairie beaver, called the tarbagan, which is found in abundance in Western Mongolia and on the shores of Lake Baikal. It is said to be as sensitive to infection of the pulmonary type of plague as the common rat is to the bubonic type. The first plague victims are said to have been six trappers who after handling large numbers of tarbagan skins were seized with violent fits of coughing, and expectoration of blood, ending in death. Expectoration is the chief means of infection, and as the Chinese crowd together in small houses, the disease is quickly spread.

—WHAT IS KNOWN as the Hope diamond has again changed hands, and is now in possession of Mr. Edward McLean, Washington, who paid the fancy figure of $300,000 for the bauble. There is a superstition regarding this stone as being very unlucky. It is said to have brought misfortune to all its owners. It is a sapphire-blue diamond 44⅝ carats in weight and has been known in its present condition since 1850. An unfortunate king of France was one of its first owners. It was once in the possession of Abdul Hamid, the deposed Sultan of Turkey. Henry Thomas Hope, an English banker, purchased it for $90,000. It next came into possession of his grandson, Lord Francis Hope, who had an unfortunate entanglement with an actress.

Western Women Lawmakers

AT THE last election, the three women shown in the photograph were regularly chosen as members of the Colorado House of Representatives. They are: Mrs. Agnes L. Riddle (standing left), Mrs. Louise Kerwin (right), Mrs. Louise M. Jones (seated). All three are women of marked ability, with good grasp of public questions and a talent for public speaking.

A Mammoth Clock

WITH the permission of the civic authorities, the committee of Philadelphia's live public men who have been organized to raise a million dollars for the Philadelphia Young Men's Christian Association, have had a great clock made and raised to a position on the City Hall, where every one passing can see it. It shows, hour by hour, the progress made in the collections, the hands advancing as the money is raised. At night, the record is registered by electric lights. This is the most novel of the various methods adopted by the committee in their whirlwind campaign.

Concerning Creeds

THERE is a great deal of discussion nowadays concerning creeds, and not a little of it is wide of the mark. One of these critics—the president of a leading theological seminary—apparently takes the ground that the proper course is to abolish creeds altogether, and to let them be remembered only as historic relics of the religions of a bygone age. Such a proposition does not merit serious consideration. However worthy it might be of an avowed agnostic, it is surely out of place as coming from one who presumably has made a study of the world's religious progress. From the earliest days of the Christian Church, there has been a "rule of faith," which, though it has undergone many changes and has been supplemented by many additions—that to some might seem like useless encumbrances—has nevertheless always kept the essentials steadily in view. These creeds, from the Apostolic and the Nicene down to the present, have been the outcome of successive generations of Christian experience. They grew by slow degrees and were submitted to the world as the reverent expression of the deepest religious conviction of the time, each in its way reflecting some newer light, some clearer revelation. To rail at these creeds, which were the product of the ablest consecrated Christian scholarship, is as illogical and futile as the proposition to abolish them. In the Christian army there are many regiments, each with its own flag, its own traditions, its own experiences; yet all yielding loyal service to the one great Captain. Each has its own form of expression of the common faith, its creed, to distinguish it from the world of unbelief, stated in terms suited to the comprehension and agreeable to the religious experience of each particular branch of the service. Yet, however the creeds may vary in details—and they do vary—all strike the true note of loyalty to the Supreme Commander. There is in the human mind the same infinite variety that is found in nature elsewhere. As well expect to attune all the birds to a single strain, or to make all the flowers to exhale the same delicate odors, or blossom alike in uniform color, as to compel the minds of men to a single form of expression for their faith and experience. "A hundred roads," says a Japanese proverb, "wind up the sides of Fujiyama, the sacred mountain, but they all meet at the top." So with the creeds; modified by varied experience as well as by tradition, they may seem to present a scene of hopeless diversity, even while they are all true and sound on the bases of the Christian religion. Nor should it be forgotten that without a creed there can be no effective church organization, no rule of action and therefore no progress in religious work, and no definite results accomplished in the Christian ministry. A creedless church would be like a ship without compass or rudder, at the mercy of every wind and without special destination.

Dynamite Dangers

NEW YORK and vicinity, for a radius of fifty miles around a common centre, felt the force of an earthquake shock when upwards of twenty-five tons of dynamite exploded on a pier at Communipaw on February 1. Fortunately, a still greater quantity of the explosive remained intact, otherwise a fearful disaster might have resulted. As it was, more than thirty lives were sacrificed, while hundreds of persons were injured by flying débris and broken glass. In lower Manhattan $250,000 worth of plate glass was shattered, and it is believed that the damage to property represents fully $1,000,000, the chief losses being sustained within an area of from eight or ten miles around the immediate scene of the explosion.

That quantities of dynamite sufficiently large to wreck a good-sized city should be permitted to be handled in dangerous proximity to a populous community is something that needs to be explained. No community could feel safe, knowing that many tons of dynamite were in transit at a distance which left little margin for safety in the event of accident. The protection of human life and property demands more rigid safeguards. One shudders to think what might have been the result had any of the New York steel sky-scrapers been within the radius of potential action. More rigid laws should be passed, limiting the quantities of dynamite or other explosives stored near centres of population. Meanwhile, it is evident that somebody was guilty of a criminal blunder; and when responsibility for the disaster has been properly fixed, it is hoped that the guilty individuals will receive their deserts. Any railroad or other corporation handling combustibles without a permit should be dealt with severely. While nothing can adequately atone for the lives ruthlessly sacrificed, it will be a satisfaction for the public to know that the criminally negligent cannot wholly escape the consequences of their carelessness.

Punishing Peonage

IT IS evident that the South is determined to rid itself of peonage, which has been a blight upon the fair fame of several States for a number of years. Five wealthy lumbermen were sentenced recently to serve terms in a United States penitentiary of from thirteen to eighteen months, and to pay fines ranging from $1,000 to $5,000. These men are rich and influential, and had there been any loophole of law through which they could have escaped, they would doubtless have done so; but the evidence produced in the United States Court at Pensacola, Fla., was convincing. Twice the cases were appealed to the President, in the hope of clemency; but he refused to interfere. We have heard a great deal concerning peonage in certain States and no doubt some of the published statements were exaggerated. Nor should these cases be taken as in any sense showing that the best element in the South—and we believe it is the largest element—has any sympathy with the practices of the men who are guilty of this grave offense against human liberty. It is to be hoped that wherever peonage exists, the offenders will be hunted out and convicted by the States themselves. It is an offense not to be tolerated in any part of this free Republic.

In the "High Places"

MORMONISM is indeed "sitting in the high places" these days. Things have changed since the time, not so many years ago, when a Mormon polygamist walked out of the House of Representatives and down the steps of the Capitol in Washington to come back no more. A reader of this journal sends us a protest from the members of the Admiral Trenchard Section, No. 73, Navy League of the United States, against the use of a likeness of Brigham Young on the silver service presented by the people of Utah to the battleship Utah, as "an offense against patriotism and good taste." We agree with him that it is "at best a poor compliment to the citizens of Utah and an insult to the navy," that the features of the arch-polygamist and inciter of rebellion should disgrace any part of the equipment of an American warship. We are tolerant in most things, but this offense is rank and unthinkable. We wonder how the plain, old-fashioned, patriotic and decency-loving American people would have voted on such a proposition!

Prison Versus Free Labor

SOME remarkable facts have come to light in connection with the present condition of convict contracts in our State prisons. Of course, convicts must be employed; but the question at issue is whether they cannot be employed to better advantage than under the present destructive system of prison competition with free labor. It was shown that in New Jersey, the prison product of handkerchiefs alone was 20,000,000 a year, convict labor in the production of which brought to the State 1¼ cents per dozen, as against four to six cents per dozen paid by manufacturers who employ only free labor. Mail-bags, too, are made in State prisons by convict labor, at a much lower figure than they can be produced by free labor. Sixty-five to seventy per cent. of the entire output of workingmen's shirts are made in the prisons. In Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Illinois, Nebraska, South Dakota and Michigan, the average price paid in prisons is only from ten to fifteen per cent. of what is paid for free labor. The red granite monument business in certain States is monopolized by convict labor companies. Convict-made goods worth $35,000,000 are produced annually, including shirts, $1,780,000; boots and shoes, $8,500,000; chairs, $2,300,000; clothing, $2,600,000. The prices paid under contract range from 27 cents to 59 cents as against $1 for the free labor product.

The whole system of convict contract, as now conducted, is radically wrong, and constitutes a menace to the industries in which free men and women are engaged. While the convicts must work, they should be confined to branches of industry that do not enter into competition with free labor. Many American States have large farms for their convicts. In several European countries, out-door labor, chiefly agricultural, is the rule in the prisons, and it is so selected and regulated that it goes far towards supporting the prison, without interfering with free labor. Some years ago, prison contracts were abolished by legislation in a number of States, but they have again come into use. At the present time there is hardly a branch of free manual labor which is not brought into direct competition with the prison product, to the detriment of the honest worker.

General Notes

—THERE IS A possibility, Washington observers say, that the Senate Finance Committee may treat the Canadian Reciprocity Treaty as an integral part of the tariff and pigeon-hole it, thus delaying it indefinitely.

—AN UNWRITTEN chapter in the early history of American interests in Korea is related by a well known missionary in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. One of the strangest features of the case is that the real facts should have remained undiscovered for half a century.

—ON JANUARY 30, there arrived at the Imperial Bank of Canada, Ottawa, the first gold bullion shipment from Porcupine, Yukon Territory. It was a bar of gold two feet long, five inches wide and three inches thick, which weighed seventy-six pounds. It came from the Timmons McMartin claim.

—ALREADY PREPARATIONS ARE going on apace in London for the coronation of King George in June. Hotel and room accommodation is being engaged, and it is expected thousands will be unable to gain apartments of any kind. America is the leader in the rush for rooms and Germany follows a close second. The lace for the Queen's coronation robe is being made at a little village in South Devon, and is of a very unique and pretty design. In fact everything required for the celebration is being made in England.

A Destructive Volcano

ON the island of Taal in the Philippines, thirty-four miles from Manila, is situated Mount Taal, whose volcanic action the last of January wrought great destruction. The mountain rises out of Lake Taal, a body of water not more than fifteen miles in circumference. The crater of the volcano, which sends out smoke at all times, became active and angry, belching forth fire, mud and melted lava. A series of earthquakes began, appalling electrical storms swept the country round about and the island itself sank to a depth of five feet or more. Then followed a fearful tidal wave which destroyed five small villages and killed nearly seven hundred people. Towns within a radius of twenty miles of the volcano suffered damage from the showers of ashes and heated stones. The natives abandoned the village and made their escape to the hills. The observatory authorities believe that Manila is in no danger, though the seismographs had recorded 714 shocks up to February 1. Five thousand families have been ruined by the disaster. The sympathy of the civilized world goes out to the people of that afflicted district. God's will is seen in the severe as well as the mild, in his material realm and in human experience. In the earthquake shock and in the volcano's flood of fire there is manifested the authority of the same God who spoke to Moses and the children of Israel from a mountain whose top was on fire.

And ye came near and stood under the mountain; and the mountain burned with fire unto the midst of heaven, with darkness, clouds, and thick darkness. (Deut. 4:11.)

Mount Taal, the Volcano whose Recent Eruption Killed 700 Persons

Hauled Down Red Flag

Following the execution in Tokyo of twelve Japanese, including a woman, for plotting against the Mikado, a band of Anarchists met at Webster Hall, in East Eleventh Street, New York City, and planned a Sunday morning demonstration in the form of a parade with red flags down Broadway. Policeman Reilly without any other help halted the procession, pulled down the red flags and arrested three or four of the ringleaders and marched them to the Leonard Street Police Station. During the excitement the crowd jammed Reilly against a closed door, and he turning himself around quickly called to a street urchin near him and said: "Sonny, take the whistle out of my pocket and blow it as you never blew before." The boy did as he was told, enjoying the fun immensely. The sound of the whistle brought policemen from every direction, who themselves blew their whistles, and a large reserve force was gathered, which at once dispersed the mob of 200 men and women who formed the procession. The lawlessness in most parts of the country exists, but it is appalling in some of the great cities; it runs riot in New York. The worst crimes are open, notorious and brazen. Anarchism is brutally insolent. Too much liberty to the lawless is despotism to the law-abiding. The Federal and State Governments will have to deal with a stronger hand with the Black Hand and the Red Hand, both stretched out from the pit to terrorize and destroy. Earthly statutes are only valuable in so far as they express the divine law. There are blessings to the communities that are law-abiding and righteous. There are curses for those who will not be obedient to the rules of truth and love.

Behold, I set before you this day a blessing and a curse; a blessing, if ye obey the commandments of the Lord your God . . . and a curse, if ye will not obey the commandments of the Lord your God. (Deut. 11:26-28.)

The Waif Becomes Governor

When Judge Alvin Hawkins was elected Governor of Tennessee thirty years ago, no one would have thought that a little ragged waif who sold papers on the street corners of Knoxville would be the next Republican Governor of the State. It so happened, and that little waif was a boy who went by the name of "Ben." Neither he nor the people knew who his father or mother might be. The little chap, seven years old, strayed most likely afoot from Newport, Tenn., to Knoxville, a distance of some fifty miles. He earned food and scanty clothing and slept anywhere he could out of the way of the wheels that might crush him. Some one was struck with the bright-eyed little urchin and had him put in an orphanage, where he was cared for for some time. Dr. L. W. Hooper, of Newport, took him to his home, where he gave him tender nursing and a splendid education. The boy took good advantage of all his opportunities, was industrious and ambitious, practised law, was a member of the State legislature, amassed a fortune of $150,000 by dealing in real estate, was active in Young Men's Christian Association, Sunday School, and church work, connected with the Baptist denomination, helped to found an orphanage in Newport for little waifs like himself, has a beautiful home life with wife and children, occupying a lovely mansion in his home city, and is as highly respected as any man in the State. He is so wise in his statesmanship, and especially so pronounced in his moral and religious convictions, that he was nominated by the Republicans and Reformed Democrats to lead in the fight against the forces of public evil in the last campaign and was gloriously elected on a platform of State-wide prohibition and the rigid enforcement of the State-wide law which is now on the statute books. There are few men in America who deserve more credit than this man, and his success is a tribute to the glorious opportunities of our free country and an illustration also of the triumphs of Christian principle. The religious element was the determining factor in the development of Governor Hooper's character and in the success of his career.

And the Lord was with Joseph, and he was a prosperous man. (Gen. 39:2.)

Human Hardware Depository

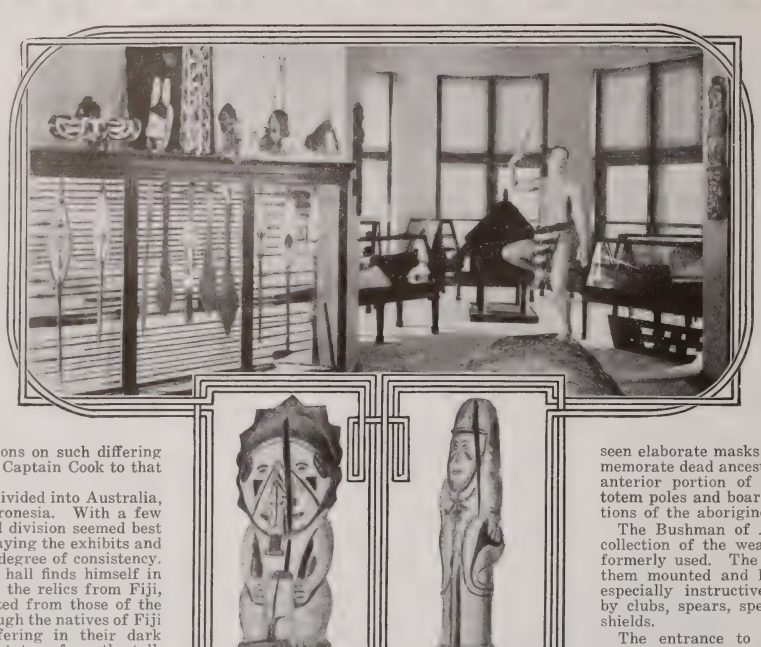
A mulatto woman called Sally L. died at the Missouri State Insane Hospital at St. Joseph the other day. There was a mystery about the malady that carried her away which was revealed by a post-mortem examination. Her stomach contained 453 nails. Five of them twenty-penny, 21 sixteen-penny, 24 ten-penny, 80 eight-penny, 113 five-penny, and 210 three-penny. Amongst the nails also were 42 screws and 9 iron bolts. Besides there were 5 teaspoon handles, 1 nail file, 5 thimbles, 63 buttons, 105 safety pins, 115 hair-pins, 52 carpet tacks, 136 common pins, 16 large white-headed pins, 31 needles, 7 broken coat-rack hooks, 70 large beads, 1 string of beads four feet long, 19 hooks and eyes, 85 small stones and pieces of glass, and a few other odds and ends. They found in her stomach all told 1,446 separate articles of hardware. In spite of this stock of metal which she carried about, a portion of a period of seven years, she was able to eat and digest a considerable quantity of ordinary food up to within two weeks of her death. This poor creature was insane and did not know any better and was in no degree responsible for her folly. There are people, however, in our time who overload the stomach with gluttony and consume it with the fires of stimulation and all excess, and make the journey to the grave in less time than the seven years required by the poor insane girl to bring herself to the end. With such persons in early Jewish history time was not allowed to take its usual course in hastening them to the grave, but they were summarily removed.

This our son is stubborn and rebellious, he will not obey our voice; he is a glutton, and a drunkard. And all the men of his city shall stone him with stones, that he die. (Deut. 21:20, 21.)

Mustard for Hens

With eggs at four and five cents apiece in the markets of the great cities, anything that will increase the laying capacity of hens is not likely to be overlooked. It is said that mustard will induce hens to lay. The experiment was tried by Mr. Ralph R. Allen, vice-president of the Poultry Club, and editor of Monthly Hints on Poultry. He gives an account of the experiment in a pamphlet. A trial was made on a mountain farm in Wales, exposed to every wind, and was carried on for a year. Buff Orpington pullets were experimented on, birds that had never laid and were as near alike as possible. The food was given plain to six birds in one pen and with the addition of one teaspoonful of mustard to six in another pen. At the end of six months the birds fed with ordinary food had laid 369 eggs, whereas the birds fed with the mustard added had laid 532 eggs. At the end of the year the hens fed on the ordinary food had laid 914 eggs and those which had had the mustard, laid 1,023 eggs. Subtracting the price of the mustard, the extra profit per bird was considerable. Further experimentation proved that the mustard-fed hens' eggs hatched as good and even better chickens than the others, and a post-mortem examination proved that the mustard had not in any way injured the flesh of the fowl. This is a simple and inexpensive experiment which our American farmers, if they have not already attempted it, are likely to try. God has given man dominion over all the lower creatures and the forces of nature, and his intelligence has much to do with educating and fructifying them. The hens and the eggs they lay are furnished as food for man, according to God's promise to our first parents.

Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you. (Gen. 9:3.)



Dog Dies of Grief

Henry G. Hasbrouck, a general of the Union Army in the Civil War, died at Newburgh, N. Y., recently. His pet dog "Bobs," a Boston terrier, pined in lonesomeness for his master and died of a broken heart the other day. The general raised Bobs from the time he was a pup, and for nine years the two were almost inseparable—always together, indoors and in the fields and woods. Knowing that something strange had happened that his master did not speak to him nor walk or play with him, he refused food entirely on the day of the general's death, and in a few weeks wasted away and died from the starvation which his grief produced. This beautiful picture of Bobs' devotion to his master suggests the depth of affection and constancy toward our fellowmen and our Saviour which God's love and law require. This constancy of love Joshua enjoined in his blessing upon the two and a half tribes as he blessed and sent them home.

But take diligent heed . . . to love the Lord your God, and to walk in all his ways, and to keep his commandments, and to cleave unto him, and to serve him with all your heart and with all your soul. (Josh. 22:5.)

ARTS OF SOUTH SEA ISLANDERS

THE directors of the American Museum of Natural History at New York formally opened to the public on January 25 a series of new exhibits grouped in what will be known as the South Sea Island Hall. For twenty years the museum has been acquiring by purchase and at the hands of generous collectors the magnificent display which now becomes an historic possession of the people, held in trust and safety by the museum authorities. The hall, which is now open to all visitors, contains collections from some of the most picturesque and interesting races of mankind—those races that have puzzled the ethnologists and have made such deep impressions on such differing personalities from the time of Captain Cook to that of Robert Louis Stevenson.

The Entrance to the New Zealand Exhibit, Showing Maori Warrior—Two Specimens of Carving

Geographically, Oceania is divided into Australia, Polynesia, Melanesia and Micronesia. With a few modifications this geographical division seemed best suited for the purpose of displaying the exhibits and has been followed with a fair degree of consistency. The visitor upon entering the hall finds himself in the Polynesian section. Here the relics from Fiji, Samoa and Tonga are separated from those of the remainder of the area. Although the natives of Fiji are racially Melanesians, differing in their dark skin, frizzly hair and shorter stature from the tall, light-colored, and straight or curly-haired Polynesians, their implements and industries are so similar to those of the neighboring Samoans and Tongans that they cannot well be separated from them. Two important differences, however, are noteworthy. The Fijians use bows and arrows, a splendid collection of which has been gathered for the museum, and their women make pottery, an art found among other Melanesians, but as unknown amongst the Polynesians as the use of the bow and arrow. Specimens of South Sea pottery that come from the ante-Christian period to which nearly all of this display is devoted are extremely rare, and the museum has been very fortunate in securing a number of first-class examples.

Equally distinctive of both Polynesia and Fiji is the manufacture of cloth from the inner bark of the paper-mulberry. This bark cloth is called tapa. In preparing tapa the women separate the inner layer (bast) from the outer layer of the bark, steep it in water, and beat it with characteristic wooden mallets. The strips of pounded bark are spread out in the sun, and pasted together with arrowroot glue so as to cover any holes. The museum collection contains fine series of decorated tapa from Fiji and Samoa, and a special exhibit has been prepared to illustrate the various stages in the process of manufacture.

As the Polynesians were entirely ignorant of metal work, their implements were of stone and the place of nails was taken by sinnet, a cordage prepared from the fibres of cocoanut husks. A series of stone adze blades, together with the wooden handles and the sinnet by means of which the two were united, is arranged to show the details of the process. The principal weapons of the Fijians were clubs and spears, of which a large collection is shown, many of them being fine examples of the inlay work for which these tribes are justly famous. Into the hard and highly polished wood of the implements are set bone and shell decorations that work out intricate patterns and withstood even the roughest usage to which the weapons were subjected.

In the section devoted to specimens from the rest of Polynesia and from Melanesia are shown the great war drums and carved clubs of the cannibalistic Marquesans, and a beautiful collection of the celebrated ceremonial paddles and adzes from the Cook Islands. This entire section is dominated by a gorgeous Hawaiian feather cape. The wonderful fabric of this cape is made by attaching tiny feathers to a basic fibre texture. The largest specimen shown is of brilliant yellow and red and is valued at $10,000. Only a few others are still in existence, most of them in Europe. Most impressive of all the Micronesian exhibits, however, are the specimens from the Gilbert Islands. The warlike natives of these islands used extremely dangerous spears and daggers set with sharks' teeth. Together with a representative series of these there are shown specimens of the protective armor worn by the Gilbert Islanders, consisting of cocoanut fibre cuirasses, jackets and trousers.

The Maori Carved Storehouse

While masks and religious carvings are not prominent among Polynesians, they abound in Melanesia. Several samples are shown in the New Guinea section, but a truly imposing array from New Britain and New Ireland is exhibited in the southern division of the Melanesian section. Here may be seen elaborate masks and carvings designed to commemorate dead ancestors; masks fashioned from the anterior portion of human skulls; and openwork totem poles and boards embodying the religious notions of the aborigines.

The Bushman of Australia is represented by a collection of the weapons and implements that he formerly used. The primitive stone tools, some of them mounted and hafted by means of gum, are especially instructive. Weapons are represented by clubs, spears, spear throwers, boomerangs and shields.

The entrance to the New Zealand exhibit is guarded by the life-size figure of a tattooed Maori (New Zealand) warrior perched in an attitude of defiance on a boulder of nephrite. Tattooing, prominent in many parts of the South Sea, is best exhibited in the museum's collections from New Zealand. While the tattooing of the body is illustrated by the cast at the entrance, the facial decoration is best shown in the wonderful series of tattooed heads—probably the best collection in the world. Such heads were generally secured from enemies, more rarely from the corpses of friends, and after the removal of the soft parts were preserved by an elaborate process of mummification. The implements used in tattooing are exhibited in the same case. A model of a Maori storage house is shown, the decoration of which is highly characteristic, but even finer work is seen in the specimens of native canoe prows, which indicate a very high degree of artistic sense on the part of their carvers, who must rank among the most remarkable of all primitive races.

The collection and preservation of all these relics are of absorbing interest and true educational value. The tribes from which they come are not only decreasing in numbers, but have, to a great extent, abandoned the barbarous customs for which these things stand. In Hawaii there are many prosperous and progressive churches and the educational standard is high. The Fiji Islands, where once demon worship and cannibalism were prevalent, now support over one thousand churches, nearly all of which are identified with the Wesleyan Methodist body of Australia. The London Missionary Society began missionary work in 1830, and since then Germans, French and Americans have aided in the regeneration of these wonderfully beautiful islands. Though once so intensely savage in many ways, the South Sea Islanders have always had many characteristics as delightful as their soft, musical language. To-day, after a generation of civilization and Christianity, they are a warm-hearted, hospitable, amiable people. Even twenty years ago the late John LaFarge wrote from a South Sea island mountain village: "This is Sunday; the native preacher gives a sermon, and speaks of the better times and how much more comfortable it was not to be liable to be eaten if one did not eat others."

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—JAMES M. BERWICK, the "Railroad Conductor Evangelist," has just concluded a series of successful meetings in the First Baptist church, Appleton, Wis. Many conversions are reported.

—MISSIONARY W. C. WILCOX of Natal acknowledges the receipt of $10 from a reader of this paper in Brooklyn and also a similar sum from Captain L. C., to aid in his African work.

—THE FOURTH PRESBYTERIAN Church of Philadelphia, founded in 1799, has paid off on its property, during the past ten years, $60,000. Mr. George Cleeland has been superintendent of the school thirty-one years. The church is now clear of debt.

—MISSIONARIES writing from China express no alarm on account of the plague. Dr. J. H. Snooke, in charge of the medical mission at Sio-Khe, North China, writes that there have been hundreds of fatal cases in that village. Of sixty persons whom he inoculated with serum, one-half recovered.

—AN EXPERIENCED missionary, speaking and reading seven languages, English, German, French, Spanish, Italian, Portuguese and Hungarian, is desirous of a settlement in New York City or elsewhere. No objection to work in Latin America. Address, "Missionary," CHRISTIAN HERALD Office, New York.

—WILLIAM STANLEY SHAW of the London Chamber of Commerce is at the head of a movement for forming a Zion League to settle Jews in Palestine, Syria and the Euphrates Valley and to encourage manufacture and general trading. It is also proposed to have the independence of the Jewish State guaranteed by various powers.

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD:

Dr. Klopsch was doing a grand work at Mont-Lawn, the Children's Paradise, and I too think the endowment of Mont-Lawn would be the most acceptable monument to his memory. He was ever planning for the alleviation of the suffering, everywhere showing his belief in the brotherhood of all mankind, as our Lord taught it whilst he dwelt here in the flesh.

I remain sincerely one of the HERALD Family.

MRS. MARY TOTTEN.

A STRANGE ADVENTURE IN KOREA

A Church Built by a Redeemed Village Where Demons Once Were Worshiped

The Old Korean Who Rescued the Chief of Police

The Sedan Chair which Conveyed the Old Korean to the Scene of the Encounter

By MALCOLM C. FENWICK

WHILE seated one day last summer in the rotunda of the Manhattan Hotel in New York, a tall, handsome, military looking gentleman seated himself beside me and started a conversation. To my amazement I learned that he was one of the staff officers of the American expedition to Korea in 1872, which was commanded by Admiral Rodgers of Civil War fame.

We were soon deep in conversation about the expedition; and the first-hand information that he gladly gave me was of the most absorbing interest to me, as I, some ten years ago, expended both money and time in an effort to learn the real facts about the loss of the American schooner General Sherman and the massacre of her crew on the Tatong River, Korea, in 1866. It was to ascertain, if possible, the details of this Sherman affair that Admiral Rodgers had been sent to the Far East. When the little fleet was about to enter the Han River the officers gathered in the Admiral's cabin to consult the meagre charts of those waters that were their only guide. A picture taken at that time has been placed at my disposal by the courtesy of my naval friend, so that I am able to reproduce it here.

Only a few minutes after this picture was taken the Admiral's flagship was fired upon by the Korean fort, and in retaliation Admiral Rodgers landed a party of marines. The party had scarcely reached shore when a rifle bullet wounded one of the most popular officers of the expedition. This so enraged the men that they waited for no further orders, but took the fort by storm. The Koreans fought well, but were no match for the angered American marines. Upon taking possession of the fort they discovered a breech-loading cannon made of wood. It is the opinion of the officer to whom I am indebted for this part of my story that the Koreans were the first to construct breech-loading artillery. With such a hostile opening it was naturally very difficult to get reliable information about the Sherman affair. Indeed, such is the bent of the Asiatic mind that it would have been difficult to learn the truth even under the most favorable circumstances. There were no American survivors to tell the story of the Sherman's fate. The only witnesses were the Koreans who did the deed. Why should they tell the truth, much less tell it straight, to their enemies who knew nothing? Such would be the attitude of the Korean mind.

About the time of the American Civil War, a young Englishman by the name of Thomas went to China to work with the Bible Society. Shortly afterwards he crossed the Yellow Sea in a junk to Korea, and learned the language. He then returned to China and attached himself to the Marine Customs, as this was the only way he could get money to return to Korea. The ablest commissioner the China Customs has ever had knew Mr. Thomas, and also knew what was to be learned in China of the expedition of the Sherman. He has told me that the men of the Sherman were a bad lot and certainly went to Korea for no good purpose.

Tomb of Emperor Kija

Founder of the Korean Kingdom

In 1866 the grandfather of the last deposed Korean Emperor, who at that time was acting as regent for his young son on the throne, undertook to get rid of the Jesuit fathers in Korea and their following. A horrible massacre from which few escaped was the result. One of the Jesuit priests escaped in an open rowboat with two Koreans, and crossed the Yellow Sea to Chefoo, a distance of one hundred and twenty miles.

Mr. Thomas was very anxious to return to Korea, so immediately engaged the Koreans to row him back. That is the kind of splendid grit that makes Anglo-Saxons proud of the blood that is in them. We must, too, admire the pluck of the Koreans who risked death to take a white man back to their country.

However, before Mr. Thomas got away from the port of Chefoo, which is the nearest Chinese port to Korea, along came the American schooner Sherman looking for an interpreter.

As near as can be learned, this ship was bound on a looting expedition. It is commonly reported its captain had heard and believed exaggerated stories of a gold coffin filled with jewels in which Kija, the founder of the Korean kingdom, was buried at his capital city on the Tatong River, and was anxious to get possession of them. His difficulty, however, was to get an interpreter. English-speaking people who could talk Korean were scarce in China in 1866. There was but one in Chefoo—Mr. Thomas. All unsuspecting, he took this easy, less dangerous and more comfortable way of getting back to the Hermit Nation.

They reached Korea and sailed up the Tatong at high tide in the rainy season. As the water rises thirty-one feet at high tide at the coast, and several feet even thirty miles up the river at the capital city, and as the water was much higher due to the rainy season, the Sherman got farther up than she could possibly have gone at any other time in the year. Enormous crowds of Koreans gathered on the banks to see the strange foreign craft in the forbidden land, and the still stranger white people. The authorities became suspicious, and no doubt believed them to be pirates.

From Koreans present on this occasion I have learned facts, and I read all that was published about the affair. It is all very mixed and contradictory. I also consulted with the Commissioner of Customs in charge at the port of Chefoo, China, at that time, who knew Mr. Thomas. The facts obtained in this way, while helpful, left the supply still very meagre and unsatisfactory.

In 1900 I went up the Tatong and there became acquainted with an old man who had met and conversed with Mr. Thomas. I was so fortunate as to get his consent to visit the scene of the encounter. Though past eighty years of age he was still a fine-looking figure, as he stood nearly six feet tall and as erect as a young soldier at attention. The most striking thing about A Reader, Ohio. Why are Protestant Irish known as Scotch Irish?

The Scotch Irish are the descendants of the Scotch Presbyterians who migrated to Ireland by invitation of James I. between 1609 and 1612 to colonize Ulster, the northern province of Ireland. Other Protestant Irish are descendants of the Cromwellians.

G. W. B., Knoxville. Name the seven largest battleships built or building and the nations to which they belong.

Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, displacement 32,000 tons; Moreno, Argentina, 28,000; Rivadavia, Argentina, 28,000; New York, United States, 27,000; Texas, United States, 27,000; Lion, Great Britain, 26,350; Princess Royal, Great Britain, 26,350.

J. A. W., Morgantown, N. C. The mouth of the Greenland whale is undoubtedly large enough to take in the largest man, but as that mouth is filled with plates of whalebone which act as strainers for the food of the whale, a man could go no farther than the mouth. The question in THE MAIL-BAG called not for the mouth but the throat. The Greenland whale can not swallow a man, but the sperm whale can do so, and there are records of whalers who have been taken out alive a half hour later. In Jonah we read that God prepared a great fish. Now, neither the Greenland nor sperm whales are fishes, but warm-blooded vertebrates, breathing air, so we shall have to seek the depths of the Mediterranean Sea to find the great fish that was specially prepared for Jonah, as whales, I believe, are unknown in that sea.

We are always glad to be enlightened. We confess that our knowledge of the interior of a whale's mouth is rather limited, being slightly second-hand; but the foregoing from a reader of this journal illuminates the subject. However, the Bible record does not specifically indicate a whale, but simply "a great fish," the original word being one employed to designate a "sea monster." There would apparently be quite as good reason for supposing it a shark as a whale, but controversy on the subject is mere speculation. Some commentators have suggested, by way of explaining the Bible narrative, that Jonah, after being cast overboard, was rescued and taken up by a ship having a large fish as a figurehead. However it is to be interpreted, the Bible story stands intact to the present day, despite all adverse criticism.

G. P., Mackay, Idaho. 1. Where in the Bible can I find the Ten Commandments? Are they given more than once? 2. What was the first commandment given to Moses?

1. See Ex. 20: 13, Deut. 5: 17, Matt. 5: 21, Rom. 13: 9. 2. See Ex. 3: 5.

Wm. C., Ingersoll, Okla. What were the conditions about the Panama Canal as to sanitation, etc., before our government took hold of the work? How have they been overcome?

The unsanitary conditions which prevailed in Panama before the Americans took charge were due to lack of proper water supply, careless arrangements for the disposal of refuge, sewage, and garbage, absence of quarantine regulations, and the prevalence of tropical swamps. Yellow fever was a very common disease, while cholera and smallpox were always to be found in some sections. The remedial measures were the establishment of a plentiful and untainted water supply, the installation of modern sewerage systems, rigid enforcement of medical sanitary regulations and draining the swamps.

J. A. O. W., Endville, Okla. 1. Please explain [illegible] 2. Please explain Eccles. 12: 6. What is the golden bowl that this verse speaks of?

This parable was written after a battle between David's army under Joab against the Edomites. It is an apostrophe to the Almighty and expresses confidence in the divine assurance of Israel's ultimate possession of Canaan and triumph over the heathen. In verse 5 [illegible] 6 [illegible] In this chapter, the preacher describes the common fate of mortality, the advance of age, and the weakening of the faculties. All the similes used are distinctively Oriental. "The daughters of music" are the voice and the ear; "the almond tree flourishing" is the white hair coming on the aged head; "the grasshopper shall be a burden" means the shriveled old man, lean and with projecting limbs, moving slowly and painfully; "the silver cord" is the silver cord of life itself; "the golden bowl" is a symbol of the preciousness of life; when the "silver cord" is loosed, the bowl is dashed down and broken. The "silver cord," in the opinion of some commentators, refers to the spinal marrow, which is white and precious as silver, and connected with the brain.

M. A. S., Clarksville, Tenn. Is the liquid contained in a cocoanut a natural product?

Yes; it is a vegetable milk, and is developed in the fruit as it ripens.

Mrs. O. D. C., Lowell, Mass. How is Christ the first fruits of them that slept? Why were not the others called the first-fruits?

His resurrection was the pledge of the resurrection of the just (see I. Cor. 15: 20). All had sinned in Adam (see Col. 1: 18), and after Christ, should rise the godly, each in his proper place. The passage deals with the first resurrection only. He is to these what the first-fruits are to the full harvest. With his return, all who share in this awakening shall rise.

L. A. R., Farmingdale. What is the best way to soften very hard water with much lime in it?

Hard waters are rendered very soft and pure, rivaling distilled water, by merely boiling a two-ounce vial, say, in a kettle of water. The carbonate of lime and any impurities will be found adhering to the vial. The water boils very much quicker at the same time.

G. H. R., Shiremanstown, Pa. What is meant by the initiative, the referendum and the recall?

The initiative is the right to propose legislative projects, as: In this country the initiative in legislation for raising revenue belongs to the House of Representatives. The referendum is a popular vote on legislative proposals which have been considered by the proper legislative body, and it gives to the people themselves the final power of ratifying, amending or nullifying laws so submitted. The recall or "Imperative Mandate," is defined as a piece of governmental machinery by which, whenever the constituents of a public official do not like his actions, they can, by signing and filing a petition for his recall, suspend him from office." If he be an elective officer, a new election is held at which the objectionable official may be a candidate. If he be an appointive officer, the appointing power must choose another man. The recall recognizes the people as the supreme power. It was adopted several years ago in Los Angeles, Calif., in the case of an alderman, and it is now incorporated in the charters of several American cities.

M. J. T., Cambria, Que., Can. Explain the Round Towers of Ireland.

The Round Towers of Ireland were erected both for worship and watching purposes by the early Christians immediately after Patrick converted the island. They form the one distinctive contribution of Ireland to early architecture. About one hundred still stand; they are of slender build, have conical roofs and few and small windows.

C. A. A., Anaconda, Mont. Where can I get the "Book of Enoch"?

It is one of the most important remains of early apocalyptic literature. It is first mentioned in Jude 14, 15, and many early Christian authors also mention it. Bruce, the traveler and Orientalist, in 1773 brought three copies of it to England from Abyssinia in Ethiopic. It has been translated several times into English, Latin, German, etc. You will find a good outline of it in any good Biblical encyclopedia. Procure from Oxford, England, through any good American bookseller.

Ancient Wedding Custom in the Hartz District, Germany

A QUAINT, curious and amusing wedding custom still prevails in the Hartz district of Germany. On the day before the celebration of the nuptials the young men of the neighborhood place a sawing-jack on the roof of the bride's house, generally on the chimney. Before proceeding to the wedding ceremony the bridegroom is requested to take the jack down from the roof. When coming home from the church the married couple are held up by a rope, and, according to the old fashion, compelled to saw a knobby trunk with a cross-cut saw, as shown in the illustration. The manner in which they perform the task is taken as an indication of how they will fare in life and whether the marriage will be happy or not. The scene represented is in the old town of Wildemann on the Oberharz.

A Reader, N. E. If a lady who has been superintendent of a Sunday School twelve years is compelled to be absent eight months of the year, should she resign, or delegate the work to an assistant?

It would seem best for the interests of the school to resign entirely. Possibly a position like "Honorary Superintendent" might be created for her.

L. M., Loomis, Neb. Will the wearing of rubber boots protect a person from lightning?

Although rubber is a non-conductor, the wearing of rubber boots will not save a man should lightning strike him in any other part of the body not rubber protected.

Mrs. J. W. M., Fairport, Va. 1. For what purpose was the woman's club called "Sorosis" organized? 2. Is the New England Woman's Club religious or secular? 3. What lesson has the Woman's Club to teach the Woman's Missionary Society?

1. Sorosis was organized for the purpose of affording thoughtful women of high character and aims an opportunity of discussing literary, educational, philanthropic, ethical and domestic problems, while enjoying at the same time social companionship. 2. Secular, though all subjects have been discussed there. 3. The Woman's Missionary Society can learn from the well-conducted Woman's Club lessons of thorough organization, enthusiastic and systematic study, and harmonious comradeship.

R. A. F., Bentonville, Va. In a recent issue you say: "We cannot agree with you that the rule of peace has already begun," but elsewhere you say: "We are a nation at peace with all the world." It is true we have no formal or legal recognition of the existence of a condition of peace, but we have peace all the same. Its formal recognition will certainly come later. And even after the final establishment of The Hague tribunal and of a general peace, we cannot expect that all the nations will come into the organization at once. There will be some heathen nations still engaged in war. It will require some years of tutelage before all are qualified to enjoy the great blessing of peace. The progress of the world will be very rapid after the full establishment of world-wide peace. We are all at peace now, only awaiting a formal recognition by the organization of a legal court at The Hague, which shall settle every dispute, without resort to arms. After the full establishment of world peace, there will be no further use for armaments.

Our correspondent, who is evidently an ardent peace-lover, takes the ultra-optimistic view. We trust he may be right. Peace, universal and abiding, will come to this war-worn world in God's good time, when the world is ripe for it. All great movements mature slowly. We are making progress in the right direction and if the Arbitral Court becomes a reality, world peace may not be very far off.

The picture is an imaginative one, representing comely women sewing for charity, in imitation of the good Dorcas (Acts 9: 36-39).

Martha Schofield, manager of the Normal and Industrial School, Aiken, S. C., writes thanking "an unknown friend, who sends me THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Many of them sacrifice much for their winter's term in school."

J. H. B., Knoxville, Tenn. We know nothing of the percentages in other quarters, but we can state for your information that any gift to a foreign missionary for his work in the field, sent through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, reaches that missionary undiminished. It is reasonable however, that in the case of any organization exclusively devoted to missionary support, a small percentage should be deducted for organization expenses.

CLINTON, IND., January 16, 1911.

TO THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

In reading about Dr. Klopsch I wonder how one man could have accomplished so much in a short life, towards making the world better. I think it would be a good plan to make Montlawn a permanent home, where little children could go, and which would be a monument to its founder. Respectfully,

PEA CULTURE AS A REAL ART

Drilling in the Seed Peas

A Field of Pea-Blossom

Loading the Freshly-Cut Vines

THE evolution of a pea from pod to can is most interesting. Looked upon in its shell the pea seems insignificant, a tiny little globule of matter; nevertheless it plays a most important part in the cuisine of our kitchens and enriches our tables with one of the most palatable of vegetables.

A can of peas, no matter how artistic the design of the cylinder, no matter how gaudy the paper or how fanciful the name thereon when standing on the shelf of a grocery store, does not appeal forcibly to the æsthetic taste or the physical senses. But when the can is opened and a competent chef manipulates the contents, such a transformation is wrought as to give zest to desire and whet the appetite with a keener relish than the costliest condiment or sauce can bestow; then the little green balls become a dish truly fit for the most epicurean taste.

A can of peas can be obtained any time—in winter or in summer. When out of season, it satisfies the longing for that particular kind of "garden sass" sometimes called green stuff, which only can be obtained when the rank growths of these plants are stimulated by the strong beams of a summer's sun and watered by summer night dews.

When the bleak winds of the winter send chilly blasts whistling through leafless trees and whirling over fields brown and sere, the canned product of the peavine can be very much enjoyed not only by those who have no pretension to being gastronomic connoisseurs, but by epicures themselves.

Average people understand but little of the processes this culinary delicacy undergoes until it appears in cans on the groceryman's shelf. That peas come from the earth and have been grown somewhere and by some one is about all that is known in general circles.

The first requisite of the farmer who intends to grow a crop of canning peas is to enter into a contract with the canner in which the party of the first part—that is, the farmer—undertakes to devote so many acres to the vegetable and harvest the crop as instructed by the party of the second part, delivering to the latter the peas on the vines when green and tender. The canner, knowing the capacity of his plant in acres when a normal crop is harvested, makes an effort to secure a sufficient acreage to keep it running during the entire season.

A pea crop matures very rapidly and a planting that is in prime condition one day may be subject to a discount one day later. If in any degree too hard, the peas are useless for canning. Peas flourish most in a moist soil, therefore a clay or sandy loam is better adapted to their growth than a stiff clay, or a light dry sand. Cool weather is also essential to get the best results, and on this account preparation for planting begins as early in spring as weather conditions will permit. To get a full stand of plants the bed for peas must be made fine with harrow and roller to a depth of three or four inches, so that the seeds may be planted at an even depth and be covered with finely pulverized earth. After preparation of the ground, the next important operation is drilling in the seed.

Bringing the Pea Harvest to the Viners

The usual method of planting is with a two-horse grain drill with hoes seven inches apart. From three to four bushels of seed are drilled on each acre, sometimes with and sometimes without fertilizer, according to the quality and condition of the soil. The final operation in the planting is rolling down, the object of which is to make the ground level in order that the vines can be easily mown. Of course, in addition the packing of the soil tightly about the seed aids in germination.

If the season is favorable to the development of the plants, a period of from fifty to sixty days is sufficient to bring them into full bloom. It requires from ten to fifteen days from the blossom stage for the pods to form and fill and the peas to mature sufficiently to withstand the threshing process. Peas that are too tender are smashed in the "viner," as the threshing machine is called, consequently they must be left until they are sufficiently hard to withstand the process of passing them through the viner.

When the vines are ready, they are all mown one way, and so they lean towards the cutting bar, which is run very close to the ground. After a sufficient number of "swaths" have been cut, the cut vines are raked into "windrows" and then the loading begins. Arrived at the factory, the work of the farmer consists of pitching the vines in small forkfuls to the "feeder," and they are then pushed slowly into the viner. It takes from thirty to fifty minutes to run a full load through the machine.

A pea viner or threshing machine is very different from the ordinary farm thresher used in separating grain from the husk. It consists of a cylinder of perforated sheet metal about five feet in diameter and several times as long and enclosed in a large box. Inside the cylinder is a shaft having many paddles. Shaft and cylinder revolve in opposite directions, and thus the peas are forced from the pods and fall through the perforations upon a moving canvas, which carries them down a receiving box, which in turn empties them into other boxes of a certain capacity. They then pass to the cleaning and grading machines, thence on to the canning department, where they are thoroughly washed and sealed in sanitary cans without the use of solder. Labels are put on and the product is ready for the markets.

F. M. LUTTS.

his appearance, however, was the broad ancient hat he wore—about two sizes larger than the modern hat. It was a present from the king, and though he had worn it for thirty-four years, it was still unbroken. The skin of his snappy face was so bronzed it was almost a shiny purple.

An enormous crowd gathered on the banks of the river to see the foreign ships. This evidently frightened the captain, who, misjudging their intentions, fired upon them with fatal results. This roused the fury of the mob on shore and started a hostile demonstration. The schooner now shifted her position, going from near the shore towards the middle of the stream. She had not gone ten lengths up stream before she grounded. The governor sent the chief of police out in a rowboat to patrol the water between the schooner and the shore to prevent the Americans from landing. The captain of the Sherman's next indiscretion was to put off a small boat and capture that official as a hostage. It was at this stage my friend came on the scene. Being a powerful, athletic fellow, and the water having subsided until it was only four or five feet deep at this point, he bravely waded out to the schooner, and speaking to Mr. Thomas asked to be allowed to go on board and comfort his cousin, the chief of police. He was permitted and for three days remained on the Sherman. He told me that Mr. Thomas and the Chinese shroff (purser, etc.) were very fine men and exceedingly kind to him.

By this time the crowd had become frenzied, and making two fire-ships, they let them down stream, directing them by wires until they reached the Sherman. In a few moments the ship was ablaze.

At this juncture my informant got the chief of police on his back and started for the shore. "Didn't they fire on you?" I asked. "No," he said, "they were going to, but I put up my hand and said, 'Don't shoot, whatever you do!' and they didn't."

By this time a number of the Koreans were in the water clubbing the members of the crew, three of whom, including the Chinese shroff, were killed in this manner. When the chief of police was in safety his rescuer came back to the scene and all was over. The governor had asked Mr. Thomas why they had come there. "To trade," was the answer. "A strange way to trade," said he. "What made you arrest my chief of police and keep him?" Then he gave the sign and seven men were speared to death. One of these was Mr. Thomas, the first Protestant missionary to Korea.

In a depression in the ground, now part of a field, under a tree in front of a farm-house, the spot unmarked and uncared for, lie the remains of this brave and devoted man. There is not the slightest evidence from first to last that he knew the real intent of the voyage. Should this account reach any of his people in England, or should any one become interested in purchasing the ground and marking the spot where he was buried, I should like to hear from them, at Wonsan, Korea.

The Korean who rescued the chief of police has received year after year decorations from the Emperior for his bravery. At the time I met him the Emperor had again asked him to come and get another decoration. "Are you going?" I asked. "No, I think not," he replied. "I am now a believer in Jesus, and what need has a disciple of his of such things?"

The Klopsch Memorial

An Appreciative Tribute to the Memory of Dr. Klopsch

By AMELIA E. BARR

WHEN good and great men are suddenly taken away by death in the midst of their life and work, the Christian world receives a kind of moral shock. This was notably marked in the case of Dr. Klopsch, for he was by no means an average man in any direction; even physically, his large brain, supple, slender figure and long nervous hands were the very implements necessary for a vivid, earnest spirit, whose great plans no average man could have conceived, much less have carried on to a ripe perfection. This estimate of Dr. Klopsch was not reached in a day or a week; it is the result of many years of a business and social acquaintance with each other.

In business he was the best and the most appreciative of publishers. If he liked the work brought him, he said so frankly, and did not think it necessary to disparage the writing in order to pull down the price. He praised whatever was worthy of praise, and paid generously for it; but he knew well that a good worker is never quite paid in cash; so he followed the example set by the Great Master, who does not grudge the "well done" to a faithful servant. If you gave him an idea, his mind instantly followed it to its outcome, and he judged it by the likelihood of that outcome. The rapidity of his judgment in this direction was something marvelous.

Early in his career he attached to himself a staff of learned and pious men, and year after year they sat at his side and helped him with their pens and their ready sympathy; and year after year I saw the same men and women in all the business departments of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. To be connected in any degree with Dr. Klopsch was to be sure of one true friend. This, however, is no miracle; others do likewise. The miracle is—how he managed to sway nearly a million of souls, at long distance from his personal influence, to do all that he desired them to do.

What magic emanated from the black and white pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, causing rich and poor, learned and unlearned readers to come cheerfully to his aid whenever a famishing nation was to be fed, or calamities of fire or flood or earthquake were to be met and conquered? There have been books which have set the hearts of men and women on fire to redress wrongs or relieve calamities; but they are few and far between; while THE CHRISTIAN HERALD yea after year has taught its readers—with a miraculous suc cess—to give generously to the hungry, the naked and th desolate. I know of no other publication in the whole worl which has been, and is, such a practical educator in th universal Brotherhood of Humanity.

This collection of immense sums of money to meet th necessities of immense national calamities he regarded a distinctively his "call" and duty; and in its fulfilment h utterly disregarded the coldness, suspicion and neglect o those who had not his broad-minded charity. It was th work he had religiously accepted, and he did it regardless o adverse criticism. He bought no newspaper eulogiums, an he asked for no personal fame or reward.

But if this work was his accepted duty, there was on great charity which was actually in every way a labor o unselfish love and pure pleasure. It was his Children' Home at Mont-Lawn. To this beautiful spot on the Hudso River, he brought large numbers of homeless, hungry crippled children from the hot, fevered streets of the Eas Side—the poorer, the more helpless, the more miserable the children, the warmer and tenderer was their welcome I have been there. I have heard. I have seen them. No wiser freer, more beautifu charity was ever con ceived in the heart o man. Here they were not only fed, clothed and made happy; they also received much in struction which they can never forget Their childish voices were taught how to sing and to pray and to speak kind words to each other; and among other lessons especia pains was taken to make them honor and love the Flag! Very quickly they learned all that it meant, and whenever it flew out over their table, o their games, their hats and hands went up joyfully to salute the starry folds which were their protector.

The Children's Temple at Mont-Lawn, Where Dr. Klopsch Spent Many of His Happiest Hours

No man of our era is more worthy of a permanent memorial than Dr. Louis Klopsch; and no more fitting one can be found than the perpetual endowment of his Children's Home.

A pyramid of marble would in no way represent him; but the living stone hewn out in the sunny rooms of Mont-Lawn for the visible and invisible Church would be an ideal monument. For doubtless many a boy who in Mont-Lawn got his first idea of what life could be, will go into the world and become a man of mark and wealth, and as he ages, he will remember Mont-Lawn, and be inspired to build on still nobler plans a home for desolate and destitute children. So that none may compute where the good deed will end, or what it may accomplish.

"He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord." If you like that security and can trust God to pay you your interest, send your new subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—for the preservation and endowment of Mont-Lawn for a perpetual Home for poor children. Let it be done, and in whatever part of God's universe Louis Klopsch is now performing God's will and doing his work the news will find him and he will greatly rejoice because his earth-friends have considered his work and put it on a sure and lasting foundation.

The Influence of The Christian Herald

MRS. BARR has sounded a real note of appreciation in her tribute to the memory of Dr. Klopsch. No one more than he understood the necessity for expanding the influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, by means of which alone he was enabled to bring to full fruition his great philanthropic projects. He himself was mighty in his magnetism and in his capacity for opening the hearts of all with whom he came in contact. But they were a handful compared to the millions he was able to influence through the columns of his paper.

It is our desire to continue his influence for good in the world by expanding THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as far as possible; for without it we shall not be able to carry on those charities which he inaugurated. And that is why we have asked you so earnestly to help Mont-Lawn, not with your money, but by asking your friends to subscribe for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD so that half of the money sent by them or by you for them will be contributed to Mont-Lawn.

If you personally contribute to this cause you will be helping it as far as your individual capacity may permit, and that help will be most welcome. But if you influence your friends to help by sending in new yearly subscriptions, you will be doing in your own way what Dr. Klopsch was enabled to do with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—to multiply his own influence for good many millionfold.

Mont-Lawn Endowment

Memorial Committee Appointed to Carry On the Work

NEVER in the history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has an appeal, issued through its columns, met with such a spontaneous and enthusiastic response as has the suggestion for the Endowment of Mont-Lawn as a Memorial Dr. Klopsch. Not only have thousands of letters been received from our friends announcing that they are working earnestly to secure subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with the understanding that half of the money so received will be donated to Mont-Lawn as a perpetual Memorial, but number of the nearest and dearest friends of Dr. Klopsch have formed themselves into a Memorial Committee, so that their influence may give the movement a national impetus. This Committee, composed of people of national and even international fame, is seven in number, and every member well known to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The Committee is as follows:

BISHOP JAMES HENRY DARLINGTON — HON. CHARLES M. PEPPER
REAR-ADMIRAL CHARLES D. SIGSBEE — IRVING BACHELLER
MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER — MRS. SARAH J. BIRD
REV. JOHN WESLEY HILL, Chairman

The association of these noted personages with the Klopsch Memorial is particularly gratifying to us at this juncture, and, coupled with the thousands of letters of approval which we have received from all over the country, gives to the Memorial plan an assurance of immediate success. Every member of the Committee was not only a personal friend of Dr. Klopsch, but each was thoroughly familiar with his unquenchable desire to multiply the influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as a power for good in the world. And each member of the Committee has lent his or her name to the Klopsch Memorial plan purely because of the influence which that name would have upon friends throughout the country.

In announcing the personnel of the Committee we cannot dwell too strongly upon the importance of the influence of friends who are anxious with us to insure the permanent Endowment of Mont-Lawn. And in urging you to help us make this Endowment a fact, we cannot too urgently insist that we do not want your money as much as we want your influence. Of course no direct contribution to Mont-Lawn will be rejected, but we would much prefer that you induce a number of your friends to subscribe to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, because in so doing you will be contributing in even greater amount to Mont-Lawn than if you forwarded merely your own contribution.

Dr. Klopsch always insisted that without the widening influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, his charities, Mont-Lawn included, would be impossible. He held it as a principle that the greater the sphere of influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the greater would be his capacity for extending his charitable work. Our attitude is the same, and we do not hesitate to proclaim it.

Just think what it would mean to Mont-Lawn if each family now subscribing to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were to induce only one friend to send in a yearly subscription, from which one-half of the money would be turned over to the Endowment Fund of Mont-Lawn! Not only would nearly half a million lives be brightened each week with the news, and the sermons, and the doings of the Christian world, but Mont-Lawn itself would be the immediate and direct beneficiary of over $225,000. Your individual effort in sending money would not in the aggregate amount to one tithe of what your influence would if you were earnestly to ask your friends in the manner suggested by us.

Some of you who have not had experience in such things, might feel a little backward in approaching your friends. But this need not deter you. Try to obtain one subscription and you will find the task so easy that others will come quickly to hand.

Already we have received communications from a number of readers who have declared their determination to become patrons of this movement, so that their names may be inscribed upon a tablet to be placed in the Children's Temple at Mont-Lawn, wherein Dr. Klopsch spent so many happy hours with the poverty-stricken children of the New York East Side. Each of these friends means to send in ten new yearly subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, aggregating $15, of which one-half, or $7.50, will be turned over to the Endowment Fund as his or her individual contribution.

You can accomplish the same by taking advantage of the ten coupons which are printed upon these pages. If you have friends in your immediate neighborhood, by all means ask them personally to help you bring about the Endowment of Mont-Lawn by subscribing to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year. It should not be hard to do this. You will not be asking them to give something for nothing, because they will receive fifty-two handsomely illustrated and well-written CHRISTIAN HERALDS, which may prove a revelation to them in the way of Christian teaching before the year is up; and you will have the credit of having contributed one-half of the price of their subscription to Mont-Lawn.

Dr. Klopsch Surrounded by Children of the East Side whom He Made Happy at Mont-Lawn

Cut out the coupons and ask your friends to sign at least one. If you wish to do so, you may forward the price of new subscriptions yourself, writing the name of each person you think would be benefited by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, on a coupon which you can forward to us with the proper amount enclosed.

If you have friends living at a distance, send them each a coupon, together with a letter urging them to take advantage of this opportunity to make a deserving charity last for all time.

If you need any help in the matter, write to The Klopsch Memorial Committee, in care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We will assist you all in our power, either by sending a sample copy to those you think should have THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, or by submitting any available literature concerning THE CHRISTIAN HERALD or Mont-Lawn.

Do this, and do it now, and you may rest assured that nothing else you could do would be nearer to what your friend Dr. Klopsch would have you do were he here to-day.

Our Boys and Girls

The Cozy Corner

Such life as his would be
A more than heaven to me:
All sun, all bloom, all happy weather,
All joys bound in a sheaf together.

No wonder he laughs so loud!
No wonder he looks so proud!
There are great kings would give their royalty
To have one day of his felicity.

CHANTECLER—The Story of a Rooster

YOU boys and girls have heard much talk of the famous story of Chantecler, the kingly barnyard rooster, that believed he called up the Sun each day, and by the superior quality of his Cock-a-doodle-doo was persuaded that he alone emblazoned the East with the soft, swift ribbons of the dawn. It is a very beautiful story, as you may imagine; a great French poet who lives in a beautiful palace in the Pyrenees was ten years writing it. Within the past year the story has grown very famous indeed. It has been translated into many languages, and people everywhere are talking of Chantecler.

We shall have to tell it here "in a nutshell," to be sure, because our space is so very limited. But perhaps some day you will be reading for yourselves this strange, lovely tale, just as Monsieur Edmond Rostand wrote it.

The Cock of the Valley

IN a beautiful valley in the French Pyrenees there lived a cock. His name was Chantecler, and, though there were plenty of chickens and many ducks, geese, turkeys, peacocks, guineas, pigeons, and Merle (a really superior blackbird in a wicker cage on the granary wall), all in Chantecler's own barnyard, besides many rare and highly bred gamecocks and other birds throughout the countryside, there was not so important a person by half among them as Chantecler.

The secret of Chantecler's importance lay in this: He had persuaded all of the feathered folk throughout the valley far and wide that it was at his call, in the darkest hour before the dawn, that the Sun rose, and brought forth each new day.

The Ingle-Nook and Fairy Tales

The Golden Hen-Pheasant

ONE evening, just as Chantecler had sent his hens and chicks early to roost, and stopped to pass the compliments of the day with Patou, the watch-dog, a beautiful golden Hen-Pheasant, breathless and spent, lilted over the barnyard wall, distractedly calling, "Hide me! Hide me! The dogs, the dreadful hunting dogs, are on my trail!"

Weak and exhausted, she nestled close to Chantecler, preening with an injured air her lovely ruffled plumage; and Chantecler protected her beneath his wings as best he could, until the cruel hunters passed by. As the Sun slowly settled in the yellow West, and for a moment a slanting ray gilded first the pump, then the old pitchfork standing near, and a tiny geranium on the picket fence, suddenly it fell upon the golden Hen-Pheasant. Chantecler, who worshiped the Sun and all his wonderful and mysterious ways, was spellbound. Never had he seen anything so surprisingly beautiful as the brilliant Hen-Pheasant standing there before him in the golden light of the setting Sun.

Like the Prince in the fairy tale, he loved her at once, and begged her not to fly away.

"No, no, I could not stay in this dull place!" she cried suddenly, while he still gazed in wonder at her. "Come away into the wild sweet forest with me. We could be so happy there!" she insisted.

"But the Dawn, My Beautiful! If I follow you into the forest, the Sun would miss me."

Quickly, jealous of his love for the Sun, the Hen-Pheasant, like the flippant, selfish bird that she was, determined that this splendid creature's love should be all for her.

Chantecler Calls Up the Sun

They had talked far into the night when Chantecler quietly left her side, hopped upon the old wall, and puffing out his chest crowed lustily many times into the East.

The dark blue of the night slowly melted to velvety purple, and to the frail blue of the early day. Then, like the utmost miracle, the Sun appeared. The valley turned to shimmering gold and the Hen-Pheasant in an instant recognized that the kingly creature standing before her was the great Chantecler.

The Nightingale's Song

Like the selfish princess in "Once upon a time" stories, the Hen-Pheasant plotted to win the Prince by robbing him of his power.

Her plot carried. Chantecler followed her the next night into the forest, and became enraptured with the magic song of the Nightingale, until everything else was neglected and forgotten.

When the forest was well flooded with dawn, the Hen-Pheasant gaily called his attention, and all his life-long illusion vanished. He was a brave, fine person, so he did not hold it against the Hen-Pheasant that she had been the means of his learning the humiliating truth about himself, and he loved her still for her wonderful beauty. But he returned to his barnyard, and the Hen-Pheasant found the forest so lonely without him, that she allowed herself to be caught in a trap, set by the owner of the poultry yard, and for love of Chantecler lived gladly in what had seemed to her the night before the dullest corner of the earth.

How Is Your Own Church?

The Third Instalment of Letters from Our Readers on this Absorbing Question

LETTERS continue to be received in large numbers from readers who are deeply interested in the discussion on the condition of our Home Churches which is now going on in these columns. Contributions from actual church members intended for this department should be brief, strictly accurate, and devoid of any undue reflections upon individuals. The discussion is one that promises to be mutually helpful to all who are interested, and the letters deserve a wide reading.

A Church Doing Its Duty

Our church is gaining in membership. The Gospel is most faithfully preached. The prayer meeting shows an increased attendance. Our pastor's earnest appeals stir many to increased spirituality. The church is doing a good work in both home and foreign missions. The lambs of the flock are well looked after. We have a very large Sunday School, and Christian Endeavor workers. The poor are bountifully cared for.

Our pastor (Rev. H. H. McQuilkin) has been with us five years. The church has enjoyed a steady growth in membership. It has now 800 members, nearly twice the membership it had when he came to the church.

San Jose, Calif. W. S. FORSEY.

Dying of Formalism

Your inquiry and invitation are timely. It is useless for Christian people to close their eyes to their own short-comings, lest some one will call them pessimists. I believe myself far within the truth when saying that the church of which I am a member has given way to a dead formalism. The relation of Christian experience, once so common and helpful, is discouraged. The requirement for membership is a moral life. Unitarianism and Universalism are covertly taught. Regeneration is said to be not a new nature, but the expansion of an old and shriveled nature. The deity of Christ is denied. All are divine as he was divine, only in lesser degree. There may be accessions to membership, but spirituality is declining in this church. To a greater or less extent this condition is true of many new Evangelical churches. Many pastors will deny it. It is true, nevertheless, and the saddest feature of all is this: These brethren—if they be brethren—are teaching their doctrines in disguise. Many of our people are accepting this teaching without a suspicion of its errors. The remedy for all this is the Gospel in demonstration of the Spirit and power. If we are to prevail, the Gospel of this century will be the Gospel of the first century. MEMBER.

The Religious Trend of Our Country

No one will for a moment contend that a country like ours, with its free, open Bible and religious liberty, can stand still, for all know that we must be moving forward to the destiny of our own making. Hence the question, whither the trend? is philosophical, leaving the optimist and pessimist out in the cold speculating. "By their fruits ye shall know them," is the law by which our judgment must be governed and decision rendered. The moral code that Jesus has given to the world in his Sermon on the Mount, if honestly lived up to by the people, as every one will understand it by reading, would make every man his brother's keeper, and thus materialize the universal brotherhod of man. In the light of our present moral condition, judged by the above law, is not the evidence conclusive that we have religiously turned our backs on Christ and are seeking to climb up some other way?

Don't you think it is time that this vast jumble of religious sects (that must include the Roman Catholic and Mormons), which collectively you call the Church, came to some kind of a crisis? The trend of religious sectism is downward, steadily lowering the aggregation of moral sentiment of our country. And it will continue to do so, until something brings us to our senses and we begin living consistently with our own knowledge, as Christ requires. There is no other Gospel to triumph.

Berrgton, Kan. H. G. LYONS.

The Old Gospel Needed in the Churches

I am a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church in a rural community. I fear the criticism the church has received has just grounds, as I see it; but I am not pessimistic. I am trusting God that wonderful things will yet come to pass through his divine power. The Church has failed to win men for Christ because it has failed to "go on to perfection," as they vowed to God and the church rules that they would. It seems that the Church is asleep while souls are perishing. In a great number of churches, the service is cold and formal—mostly lip service, while in their hearts they are far from Him and know not Jesus. May God arouse the church!

Too much is spent on the building of churches when it should have been used for the salvation and help of precious souls. The Gospel in its truth and purity will always draw and attract the multitudes, but in many cases, everything but the Gospel has been talked about, and so the people are repelled. Many ministers have shamed to declare the whole counsel of God and failed to urge the people to obtain the experience of full and complete salvation as God has provided it and revealed it through the precious Word. And so they have lost power and favor with God. But our people are hoping for a spiritual revival, and I have assurance it will come. The Lord has faithful, devoted ones here, and our pastor preaches the Gospel as he sees and believes it. He has many times helped me. We need the pure Gospel and the whole truth. It is "the power of God unto salvation unto every one that believeth." It doesn't need any twistings, sugar-coating or modern improvements. A FRIEND AND SUBSCRIBER.

Churchianity vs. Christianity

The church I am connected with is one of four evangelical denominations in a Western town of about 800 souls, surrounded by a thinly settled country. A divided church and the fact that they are not strong enough to pay an able pastor a salary commensurate with his needs, are the reasons of loss in membership and failure of the church to make good. Again, the Lord's money is being wasted in an attempt to foster "Churchianity" in advance of Christianity. ULYSSES G. WILLIS.

Holyoke, Colo.

Signs of Spiritual Decline

Nowadays, we are told in church that if a child is raised and trained right, he will always be in the kingdom and will not need to be converted or born again. I do not remember having heard a sermon on the new birth for years. Sinners are simply asked to come over to the side of the church and to believe in Christ as their personal Saviour. There is no class or leader. Nothing is said about gaudy apparel or the wearing of jewelry. Nothing is said nowadays about attending places of public amusement. Lately, a public minstrel performance was given by local talent, consisting almost entirely of prominent members of our own and other churches. Sunday evening services are sometimes supplemented by stereopticon views. Last year we had a good revival, conducted by a traveling evangelist, which increased the membership considerably. A union revival of four different denominations has now been in progress for two weeks, with hardly any visible results. Do the converts stand? Yes; but in a year it is sometimes hard to tell where.

Missionary interests are kept well to the front. The sick and poor are pretty well cared for. In temporal things, the church is in a prosperous condition. As to its spiritual condition, you may draw your own conclusions.

Conway Springs, Kan. J. L. HEISEY.

A Church's Rapid Growth

The South Baptist Church of New Bedford in its development has been a miracle of grace and works. I was asked to preach for the church in January, 1906, and agreed at first to serve the church only three months. At the end of four months I became permanent pastor. Many rose for prayers in 1906, but we had not a convert until January, 1907, since which time I have baptized seventy-two people, twenty-four of them men. Since then we have paid off the debt on the building and raised $1,968 toward a new building, bought a corner lot for $1,850, and broke ground for our new church in August, 1909. Our new building was dedicated January, 1910. We now have a property valued at $20,000, membership 100, Sunday School attendance of 200, a Young Men's Baraca Class of forty members; home department of forty, Young Ladies' Philathea Class of thirty and an increasing church attendance. We preach Christ and him crucified; the Old Gospel, witnessed by the Holy Spirit and supported by a regenerated church.

I have been a subscriber to your excellent paper for several years. Its faith in the Gospel of Christ and the stand it has always taken for evangelical religion has made me a warm admirer, and I have often thanked God that we have such a weekly paper.

New Bedford, Mass. REV. THOMAS S. SAYER.

"Don't Bake Any Beans for Me"

Some thousands of men have said that to their wives after tasting a dish of Van Camp's. And a million more ought to say it. For the baking of beans is a long, hot task. It must be started sixteen hours in advance. And the result is a failure in any home oven if digestibility means anything at all.

The proper baking of beans in a home oven is utterly out of the question. Beans must be baked in live steam.

They need twice the heat that you ever get to the center of the home baking dish. That heat is required to break up the food particles so the digestive juices can act. Otherwise the beans, instead of digesting, ferment and form gas.

In the Van Camp kitchens the beans are baked in steam ovens, heated to 245 degrees. They are baked in small parcels so the full heat goes through. The beans are digestible.

They are baked without crisping, without bursting the skins. So the beans come out nut-like, mealy and whole.

They are baked with the tomato sauce, permeating every atom with a delicious zest. The result is the likable kind of baked beans.

These beans remain, until you open the can, exactly as they came from the oven. Not a savor is missing, not a flavor is changed.

The housewife keeps them on the pantry shelf, ready to serve in a minute. They become her most convenient meal.

When Van Camp's are used, baked beans become a very frequent dish. And beans are 84 per cent. nutriment. They are richer than meat in food value, and cost but a third as much.

Doesn't it seem that every housewife would welcome such a dish?

"The National Dish" Van Camp's BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE PORK AND BEANS "The National Dish"

But get the right beans, else you'll be disappointed. Van Camp's are made of the whitest and plumpest Michigan beans—beans all of one size. The sauce is made from whole tomatoes, ripened on the vines. We could buy dry beans for one-fourth what we pay. We could buy tomato sauce for one-fifth what ours costs. But the result of our way is a dish five times as good. When you once taste this dish you will insist on Van Camp's.

Serial Story by FLORENCE MORSE KINGSLEY

XXI—Continued

DAVID smiled down at Barbara brilliantly, his eyes, his tawny hair, his white teeth and his ruddy color suggesting the magnificent youth and virility of a pagan deity, newly alighted on the common earth.

"The fact is, Barbara," he went on confidently, "you've lived here so long practically alone that you're a bit spoiled. What you need is to give up trying to control everything and everybody and just be a sweet little wife. Didn't you know that?"

Her eyes drooped under the blue fire of his gaze. David laughed aloud.

"I'll make you happy," he said, possessing himself of her hand. "You won't know yourself a year from now, little girl. All this worry will be over; and I'm never going to allow you to bother your dear little head again over farm-products and such things as cows, pigs, and chickens. I mean to give up a lot of that sort of farming. It doesn't pay, and it's a whole lot of useless bother and expense. There! what do you think of my horse? Isn't he a beauty? Look at his head and eyes, will you? and the build and color of him! There's blood for you, and I tell you he's a hummer on the road."

Barbara passed a knowing little hand over the satin neck, and the horse turned his large full, intelligent eyes upon her with a whinny of welcome.

"He likes you, Barbie; first thing. Perhaps you can drive him after a while. But just now he's like a certain little woman I know, a bit restive and needing a strong hand to guide and control. You don't mind my seeing it so clearly, do you, dear?"

Barbara threw back her head and looked at him from under lowered lashes.

"I mind your saying it," she said. "And I may as well tell you now that I don't intend to discharge Peg; and I must always have a voice in the management of the farm. It is Jimmy's farm, you know."

"I've heard you say so before," he said sulkily. "But why isn't half of it yours, I'd like to know?"

"Because Jimmy is the last Preston, and father wanted it so. I shall have all that comes off of it, till Jimmy is of age. We——"

She hesitated, with a doubtful look at him. "There is other good land near. We shall perhaps be able to acquire it; start fresh orchards——"

"Perhaps — perhaps!" he echoed irritably. "I'll tell you straight it's all nonsense. Under the law you're entitled to half. Ask old Jarvis, if you don't believe me."

He watched the quick color rise in Barbara's face with a low laugh of arrogant amusement.

"Jarvis is a curious old duffer," he added, lazily stroking the smooth shoulder of his horse. "But he knows rather better than to tackle me on certain subjects."

His eyes were fastened on Barbara, narrowly watching her.

"He's tried it once or twice; but I cornered him each time. He hasn't been here lately, has he?"

"No," said Barbara faintly.

"Well, he'd best keep his distance; that's all."

He turned quickly at the sound of a boyish whoop from behind.

"Oh, hello, Jimmy!" he said carelessly. "How's your Majesty's highness to-day?"

"I'm pretty well, 'xcept that bof my front teef are loose," replied the little boy seriously. "I can't eat corn or apples, 'cept wiv my side teef."

"Don't you think it's about time you taught that boy to speak the English language, Barbara? It's teeth and with, my boy. Don't let me hear you make that babyish blunder again."

The child hung his head, his face flushing to a shamed scarlet under his thatch of yellow hair.

"I'm going to try," he said manfully.

"Want to take a ride with me, old man?" asked David. "Your sister says she can't."

Jimmy looked up eagerly into Barbara's face for the coveted permission.

"I'm going to drive over to the fair," pursued David. "I'd like to take my best girl along pretty well; but you'll do, Jimmy."

Barbara hesitated, her eyes averted.

"Of course, if you're afraid to trust him with me—" mocked David. "I've got a tolerably fast horse here, and I'm supposed to be a reckless——"

"It isn't that," she interrupted hurriedly. "He can go, if he'd like to."

Jimmy burst into a shout of joy.

"I guess I'd better brush my hair," he exulted, "and put on my best clo'es! Shall I, Barbara?"

"You're well enough as you are," David said, peremptorily. "Jump in, boy, and we'll be off!"

She stood watching them as they drove away, the little boy's yellow hair blowing about his rosy face.

"Good-by, Barbara!" he shouted. "We're going awful fast!"

David's attention seemed centred upon his horse. He did not once look at the girl, as she waved her hand in token of a cheerful good-by.

XXII

David was quite his expansive, good-humored self again by the time he and Jimmy reached the fair-grounds. He joked with the little boy about his capacity for pink lemonade and peanuts as he drove his spirited young horse carefully into the crowded enclosure; and Jimmy, all eager and glowing with joyous anticipation, gazed with round eyes at the stirring scene. Everywhere flags fluttered merrily in the wind, and the crash and blare of band-music mingled with the shouts of vendors, the trampling of feet, and the hum of many voices.

"Hello, Dave! goin' t' trot that nag o' yourn?" called a voice from among the crowd of men and boys lined up along the race-track.

"Oh, hello, Bud Hawley! That you?" responded David, pulling in his horse. "Why, no; I hadn't thought of it. It's too late to enter, isn't it?"

The Barford liveryman, tipping a solemn wink at the men near him, slowly advanced and stood, his hat pulled low over his eyes, examining David's horse. He passed an experienced hand over his withers, felt his hock-joints, lifted his feet and stared critically at the frogs and the setting of his shoes. Then he sauntered around in front and looked the animal full in the face, his cautious hand still feeling, caressing, sliding from neck to powerful shoulder, from shoulder to slender foreleg.

He glanced kindly at Jimmy.

"Well, son," he went on, "how d' you like the fair?"

"I like it," Jimmy said shyly. "I like the music an' the horses an' the flags—an' everythin'."

"Want to get out, old man, and take in the side-shows?" asked David.

"What are side-shows?" Jimmy demanded guilelessly.

Mr. Hawley laughed heartily.

"Just a little bit of everythin'," he nswered. "The's the ag'cult'ral ex-ibit—I seen your apples an' a pile o' hem onions Peg Morrison's be'n aisin' in there. An' there's the oman's tent, with the bigges' lot o' atchwork an' jell'-cake an' canned uit y' ever saw. I jus' come f'om here. Y' c'n hitch over yonder, if y' an' to, Dave."

David's eyes had been roaming omewhat impatiently over the gay ene. He thrust his hand into his ocket.

"See here, boy," he said to Jimmy, you take this small change and go round to suit yourself. I don't care nything about all that sort of thing. ut you can take it in as long as ou've a mind to."

"What! All b' my lone?" asked immy, a frightened look in his brown yes. "I guess I'd rather stay wiv ou, David."

"Nonsense!" said David sternly. You're not a baby, are you? Can't ou walk around and look at pigs and hickens and patchwork quilts without guardian? You've got to quit being ich a mollycoddle, my boy, and we'll gin right now. Come! jump out, nd I'll look you up after a while. ou couldn't get lost, if you tried. un along now and have a good time."

"Her brother, ain't it?" inquired Mr. awley, as David lifted the child to the ound.

"Get in, won't you?" David said, noring the question. "We'll look to that race proposition. I don't now but what I'll go in for it. I ouldn't mind making a little money," added with a gambler's greed.

Mr. Hawley accepted the invitation th a backward glance at Jimmy, who ood watching them forlornly, his sy mouth half open, the silver pieces ghtly clutched in one moist little nd.

"Kind o' small, ain't he, to be goin' ound by himself in a place like this?" ventured. "I'll bet his sister ouldn't like it over an' 'bove."

"He's been pretty well spoiled," avid said sharply. "I intend to make man of him, and this is as good a y to begin as any. There's nothing hurt him around here."

"You may 'xperience some trouble in 'atin' him after a spell," opined Mr. awley, shaking his head. "I remem-r m' wife let me bring one o' our ys t' the fair once, a number o' ars ago, when Lansing, our oldest y, was 'bout five. I was lookin' at live stock, an' Lance, he got kind tuckered out, an' I sez to him——"

'Oh, cut out the details," David in-rupted. "You didn't lose the kid good, did you?"

'No; I got him after a while, but it etty near scared the life out o' me ' him both, I remember, 'n' m' wife."

'Come," said David, with some im-tience, "and we'll enter the horse." After he had settled the prelimi-ries of the race, David sauntered th with a hazy notion of looking up mmy and taking him up to the andstand. To this end he walked wly through the agricultural "pa-ion," with its exhibits of mammoth getables and pyramids of red, en and russet fruit; but nowhere he catch a glimpse of Jimmy's low head topped with its scarlet n. There was a crowd of women in next place of exhibition, where the e and canvas walls were covered h quilts of wonderful and compli-ed design, varied with areas of nted tapestries, homemade lace, rsted and crochet work, while the row shelves below were occupied h brown loaves, raised biscuit and sted cakes, interspersed with jellies brilliant hues and luscious fruits served in lucent syrups. There 'e many children here, clinging to ternal hands and skirts, but no mmy.

"Little nuisance," muttered David irritably. "He ought to have stayed where I told him to."

He was elbowing his way through a group of women engaged in an excited discussion concerning the merits of two rival lace counterpanes when a small girlish figure placed itself directly in his path.

He stopped short and looked down into the babyish blue eyes uplifted timidly to his.

XXIII

"Why, hello, Jennie," said David, smiling. "Where did you come from?"

The girl was very becomingly dressed in dark blue serge, the jacket thrown jauntily wide, revealing a waist of cheap white lace, which in its turn permitted glimpses of the pink skin and rounded contours beneath. A hat of dark blue straw wreathed with small pink roses, rested coquettishly on her light brown curly hair. At the moment of meeting David thus unexpectedly, the light of youth and love shone vividly over the girl's insignificant face and figure, irradiating them into a beauty almost noble.

David could hardly help noticing the half infantile, wholly adorable curve of her young brows and the clear blue light of the eyes beneath. Then his curious eyes slowly swept the soft oval of the pink cheek, and the rosy mouth, parted a little to ease the tumultuous heart-beats which shook the transparent stuff at her throat.

"I didn't know as you'd want to speak to me, Mr. Whitcomb," murmured the girl.

Her eyes wandered uncertainly past him into the crowd.

"I s'pose," she added, thrusting out her pink lips in a pout, "that she's here somewheres."

"No," laughed David. "She doesn't happen to be along to-day."

A wayward impulse prompted his next words.

"What do you think, Jennie? I asked her and she wouldn't come with me."

"Wouldn't come—with you?"

The girl's voice held wonder, incredulity, longing. Her eyes said more.

"You wouldn't treat me that way, would you, Jennie?"

The girl looked down, an unsuspected delicacy sealing her lips.

David looked at the pretty shadowy circle of the long lashes on the smooth pink cheek.

"You wouldn't, now, would you, Jennie?" he persisted.

The girl glanced at him sidewise, and tossed her head.

"What do you want t' know for?" she demanded. "If you don't like the way she treats you, you c'n tell her so, can't you?"

David bit his lip.

OUR COMFORT CORNER

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Sad Hearts

"THERE are lonely hearts to cherish, as the days are going by." Have we seemed at times to forget that in our great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family there are vacant chairs, that here a mother is folding away tiny garments and putting by little shoes, and standing silently and sadly beside an empty crib, and that somewhere else over there in the next street, the next town or across the continent perhaps, children have lost their parents, and husbands and wives have been separated by death? The household of the sorrowing always has its recruits. There is always need for the sympathetic grasp of the hand, for the word of consolation and the reminder that earth hath no sorrows that heaven cannot cure. Times come when we must sit down and comfort each other, and look upward to the steadfast stars and beyond them to the everlasting joy and the home where there is no parting. After all, this life is only the door-way to the life that has no ending. These earthly friendships of ours may apparently be interrupted, but to the Christian the interruption is short and the friendship goes on to be resumed again in fulness in the sweet by and by. The last sentence in George Macdonald's exquisite story, Robert Falconer, has always made its appeal to me. "The great ship went down in mid-ocean, and I have not yet seen my friend again."

A little one was taken suddenly from a home of deep tenderness and love. Two days later the child's father wrote to me in these words: "Mary and I are indeed bereft, but we are not crushed. We are able to thank God that our darling's life was free from a single shadow and that he was taken swiftly and painlessly in the arms of an angel to the home above."

Cheer One Another

THERE are other trials in which comfort is sorely needed, trials greater than that of bereavement or than witnessing the suffering of those we love. What we call a living trouble is as hard to bear as the trouble which comes in the endurance of grief. This comfort corner is for every one who is familiar with sorrow in any form. You may write as confidentially or as openly as you please, being assured that nothing will be published on this page without your entire consent. You may write a cheery word for the help of your neighbor. We should try as best we can to help one another on the road, to be good comrades, and whenever we can to light a little candle that may dissipate surrounding gloom. Comfort one another

With the hand-clasp warm and tender,
With the grace that love can render,
And the glance of friendly eyes.
Do not wait with words unspoken,
Let the loaf in love be broken;
Gentle speech is oft like manna from the skies.

His Ways Not Our Ways

HELEN HUNT in one of her sweetest lyrics speaks of watching a mother as she tends her babies by the nursery lamp. Then she adds: "Christ, the Good Shepherd, watches mine tonight, and that is best."

Often the ways of God are very mysterious. Why, for instance, should a man in the pride of his youth, or a girl in her radiant morning, be taken away when life was unfolding in rare beauty, and on every side there were opportunities for service, while in lingering anguish or imbecility some one else continues to live? We cannot answer this question. We must leave it, with many another, with our heavenly Father who never makes a mistake, and dependence on whose will is our privilege and the source of our strength. Cowper's hymn answers this ever-repeated question in the only way it can be answered:

Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan His work in vain;
God is His own Interpreter,
And He will make it plain.

A Still Unsolved Problem

MANY kind suggestions have been made by our readers for the amusement of an elderly man with impaired sight and hearing. Some suggest that he shall be interested in pets, dogs, cats, and birds. Others think that if there are no children in the family, children may be borrowed as little visitors to cheer him up. None of the suggestions made are quite so practical as that of a reader who fancies that if he is a good story teller, he may be asked to entertain a group of people around the fire in the evening, or relate his reminiscences at meetings of a kindly woman's club. Alas, there is the obstacle of the "if." Comparatively few elderly people are gifted as story-tellers, though undoubtedly there are those who shine in this especial field. Nobody has as yet thought of any easy and feasible way in which a man situated as is the one who has awakened so much sympathy, may find work which he can do and by which he can support himself. Life bristles with difficulties for old people who are not strong, who are conscious of impaired faculties and who see themselves distanced in the race by young and strong competitors.

Home Decorations

IN DECORATING a house for a particular occasion, the flowers of the season may be depended upon to give an air of beauty and lend a definite charm. In winter, when garden flowers are not to be had except in the far South, palms and evergreens with myrtle and smilax are a great resource. Roses and carnations with other flowers of real loveliness and delicate fragrance may be secured from the florist. If one's home is remote from the city, and the florist cannot be conveniently reached, a neighbor may usually be found whose successful touch with house plants gives her plenty of winter bloom and affords her the pleasant opportunity of dispensing flowers to her friends who may need them. In May daffodils and violets, in June daisies and roses, in August lilies, in October chrysanthemums; flowers of some description may be found the whole year round for festal decoration. I plead for home decoration when no particular function has the right of way. A flower on the breakfast table, a dish of ferns or partridge berries, or anything that is bright, green and attractive, adds grace to the simplest meal. Let the daughter of the house make its ornamentation her care.

I wonder if good housewives will pardon the suggestion that in winter, both by daylight and lamplight, nothing gives so vivid an expression of

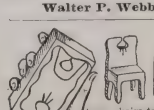
A THREE WEEKS' STRUGGLE.

How a Working Girl in Minneapolis Lived on Six Dollars a Week and Saved Money With Which to Buy Shoes.

While the high cost of living brings to light many stories of deprivation and hardship, it also serves to educate the public in a very impressive, forceful way regarding the nutritive value and sustaining power of many inexpensive foods. Through the stress of hard times the public quite often learns that going without certain foods is, after all, not a hardship but a benefit. Most persons have already learned that it is easy to cut down the supply of high-proteid foods, such as meats and eggs, without any loss in strength or vitality and with a considerable gain in health.

The "Minneapolis News" of December tenth contained the following interesting account of one working girl's experience in endeavoring to adjust her low wages to the problem of daily living:

"This is not an advertisement for shredded wheat biscuit. Rather it is an advertisement of a girl's brave holding fast to the good and true. She lived for three weeks on shredded wheat biscuit and water so that she might get a pair of shoes.



"The girl was one of four clerks. Each got six dollars a week, and to make living possible they occupied one room, in which two beds took up the biggest part of the space. Each contributed $1.25 to the general food fund each week. The rest they spent on clothing, for they were expected to dress well; on carfare and on down-town lunches. There was not any left over, even though they saved and skimped, and tried to get along with a little less every week.

"Then one of them needed a pair of shoes. Her only means of getting them was to withdraw her $1.25 from the pool. When the rest ate their small breakfasts and suppers, cooked on a one-burner gas stove, she ate the biscuit at the same table. They offered her a part of their food, but she refused, knowing that they would have just that much less, and 'besides, they were my shoes, not theirs, I was trying to pay for,' she explained. She couldn't buy milk, much less cream, to soften the food. Butter was just as much outside the means of her pocket-book—when she was saving for shoes. So water took the place of the other things, and for three weeks the girl ate nothing else."

Such experiences as this are repeated over and over again in all parts of the country. While it may impress the superficial reader as a hardship to be compelled to live on Shredded Wheat Biscuit and water, it is a fact that nothing could be more sustaining or satisfying than this cereal food. It would be an easy matter to live on this food indefinitely and at the same time reach a high working efficiency. Eaten with water or hot milk and a little fruit Shredded Wheat will not only supply all the strength needed for any kind of work, but will insure a healthful and natural condition of all the functions of the body.

decorative effect to a home as absolute neatness. There is, of course, such a mistake as banishing from the living-room everything that looks like living. Books and papers scattered about seldom convey an idea of disorder. But whatever is untidy or negligent, whatever is manifestly out of place, detracts altogether from the comfort and elegance which may appertain to the simplest room. A friend told me that when she furnished her home the money was almost all spent before she arrived at the living-room. She had only the meager remnants of what had been originally a very small sum, and in this she had to rely or leave her living-room bare and empty for months. She was a woman fertile in expedients. At a second-hand shop she purchased an old pine table with leaves. She bought a few cheap kitchen chairs and painted them all in forest green, having previously repaired and strengthened them judiciously. Then she stained her floor, put up some muslin curtains, pinned a picture or two to the wall, without bothering herself about frames, brought in two old rocking chairs which she covered with cretonne cushions, and there was her restful room as complete and harmonious as though a long purse had been behind it.

Sleeplessness and Its Cure

MANY friends have written suggesting remedies for insomnia. Among them one lady recommends the drinking through the day of bran tea. This is her recipe: Bring three pints of water to a boil. Add a coffee cup of bran; have the water boiling when the bran is put in and let it boil without a cover until the bran no longer floats on top. Then cover it and boil slowly for ten minutes. Strain it into a pitcher, let settle and drink this quantity during the day.

Others recommend hot milk sipped slowly before retiring. As sleeplessness is often due to indigestion a number of sufferers have found that by eating their food very slowly according to the methods of Mr. Fletcher, they have been restored to good health and have routed the demon.

In a general way it may be added that a good conscience and freedom from mental worry are likely to produce refreshing sleep. The subject has been so fully canvassed that at present no more letters dealing with it can be presented.

At A Distance From Church

I AM the mother of five little children. We live in a lonely neighborhood four miles from a church of the Protestant faith. Our nearest neighbors are French Catholics. They are kind-hearted people, but not in sympathy with us, and I cannot let my children play with theirs. My greatest trouble is how to keep my children in the right way, as they cannot attend Sunday school, and Sunday is so much like every other day. We have no way of getting to church, except by walking over a rough road. In summer it is too hot and I am not strong enough to make the attempt, and in winter the drifts are too deep. Can you give me any advice?"

E. H.

Gather your little ones about you Sunday, tell them Bible stories and teach them in the simplest manner you can that Jesus is their friend and that he wants them to be his little flowers. Make the Lord's Day one of ease in your work. Old-fashioned Christian women used to prepare the Sunday dinner mostly on Saturday. This would be a good plan for you. Pray for your children and with them. It may be that after a while you may have church privileges nearer your home than is now the case. At least this would be something to pray for.

The Heart of the Home

A REAL family circle is primarily composed of father, mother, and children. It may be sufficiently elastic to include beloved outsiders—aunts, uncles, and cousins—and occasionally throw its mantle of protection around the stranger guest, a lad away from his home or a young woman studying, teaching, or wage-earning in some way at a distance from her home people. Father and mother and the boys and girls, from the student in the high school to the baby in the cradle, are the ideal members of a domestic group. An only child is in great danger of being spoiled by oversolicitude on the part of parents. Three or four children help to bring each other up. A wise physician once said that if only the oldest child in a family were well started, the others would follow the example unconsciously set by this one, and would give very little trouble to parents and teachers.

The fact is that youthful parents are generally in danger of bestowing too much discipline on the first comer in the nursery. Later they relax their vigilance, and the last in a succession of children is petted and indulged in a measure that would seem hazardous. Yet, if there is real affection and unbroken confidence in a family, there is seldom need for penalties and little occasion arises for harshness. If children are taught obedience to parents, because parents themselves must be obedient to God, if they tell the truth and are willing to yield their own will that others may be gratified, they are on the path to noble maturity.

At Wits' End Corner

ARE you standing at "Wits' End Corner,"
Christian with trouble brow?
Are you thinking of what is before you,
And all you are bearing now?
Does all the world seem against you,
And you in the battle alone?
Remember, at "Wits' End Corner"
Is just where God's power is shown.

Are you standing at "Wits' End Corner,"
Blinded with wearying pain,
Feeling you cannot endure it,
You cannot bear the strain?
Bruised through the constant suffering,
Dizzy, and dazed and numb?
Remember, to "Wits' End Corner"
Is where Jesus loves to come.

Are you standing at "Wits' End Corner,"
Your work before you spread,
All lying begun, unfinished,
And pressing on heart and head?
Longing for strength to do it,
Stretching out trembling hands?
Remember, at "Wits' End Corner"
The Burden-Bearer stands.

Are you standing at "Wits' End Corner,"
Yearning for those you love,
Longing, and praying, and watching,
Pleading their cause above?
Trying to lead them to Jesus,
Wond'ring if you've been true?
He whispers at "Wits' End Corner,"
"I'll win them as I won you!"

Are you standing at "Wits' End Corner?"
Then you're just in the very spot
To learn the wondrous resources
Of Him who faileth not!
No doubt to a brighter pathway
Your footsteps will soon be moved,
But only at "Wits' End Corner"
Is the "God who is able" proved!

OPPORTUNITY

"YES, Jake Burroughs is a rich man now, and here I am still pottering away at the old job, and no better off than I was the day I started. Jake and I were schoolmates, and I was ahead of him in all our classes, and I led him in all our games, and since we're grown up I've worked just as hard — harder, indeed — and been just as temperate, but he's rich and I'm poor. Why is it? Why, it's because he had the opportunity!"

Now, we know prosperous Jake Burroughs, and we have long known his old schoolmate, who made the foregoing complaint, and who is strongly of the opinion that the difference in their life positions is due entirely to the better opportunities of the successful man. A careful examination of the lives and characters of the two men does not warrant the belief that opportunity was the deciding factor in either case.

A Bad and Good Beginning

Far be it from us to underestimate the importance of opportunity. If there is never an opening for the display of energy and talent, the possessor, so far as results are concerned, might as well be without either, just as there may be no end of wasted opportunities if the right man be not on hand to avail himself of them.

But to come back to the schoolmates. The man who made the complaint, while bright and strong as a schoolboy, did not continue, after adult life, the promise of his youth. He learned, as did his schoolmate, the bricklayer's trade. Both earned just the same wages; both were regarded as respectable young men, with equal advantages, or if there was any difference it was not in favor of the less sprightly and less good-looking Jake Burroughs.

Being good-looking, the failure, if we may so call him, dressed very well. He was very popular with the girls of his class—too popular, indeed, for his bank account, if in those days he had ever given a thought to saving. As a consequence of such associations, he married early, married a woman scarce fitted to a wife and wholly unfitted to be a mother; but she bore many children, most of whom died in infancy. Under such circumstances success was out of the question.

The young bricklayers found plenty of work in their neighborhood, which was the growing suburb of a great city. Unlike his schoolmate, whose parents were self-supporting, Jake Burroughs was handicapped by the care of an invalid mother, and he was scarcely out of his apprenticeship when his only sister was left a widow with two children, and he gave them a home, nor ever complained, for what many thought to be a burden, he regarded as a work of duty and love.

It was a long story and a hard struggle in the making; it will take but a minute to outline it. Jake Burroughs determined to become his own landlord, and in order to do so he joined a building association, and within two years he was living in his own house, his though two thirds of its value were covered by a mortgage; but the rent now, instead of being a dead outlay, went to swell the amount of his savings.

The Result of Thrift

In time Jake Burroughs became a partner of his old employer. Further on the firm became builders on their own account. They bought land by the acre, put up good cheap cottages, and got more for one lot than the cost of an acre. Being foresighted and reliable, the firm built up a reputation with the banks, and this has been maintained with honor. Looking back to beginnings and tracing this fine record to its ultimate success, can we honestly say that Jake Burroughs owes his rise to opportunities?

Another Illustration

We hear a great deal about "good luck" and "chance" as factors in success. We have no faith in "chance." There is, indeed, no such thing as chance in the usually accepted meaning of the word, which is that a thing happens without a prearranged cause. The unexpected is continually happening, but it is just as much the result of a rational cause as if it had been planned and worked up to for a decade. A poor man may, unexpectedly, be left heir to a large estate, just as a good man, hurrying to do a good deed, may be struck by lightning; but even these things are not exceptions to the unvarying law of cause and effect.

A man may have a stroke of good luck, but he cannot be invariably lucky without unvarying effort of brain and muscle. The men who are always "chancing" on good things are invariably the men who are making opportunities, instead of waiting for them to turn up.

This is the case of Casper Turner—that is not just his name, but it will do. Five years ago Casper Turner, aged forty, and owner of a little truck farm in the heart of the scrub oaks and dwarf cedars down in the flat, sandy reaches of southern New Jersey, in order to keep his youngsters at school assumed the duties of mail carrier on a rural free delivery route. The roads, spring, summer, and winter alike, were always at their worst. Excepting a log cabin and a truck patch here and there, most of the route was unexpressibly monotonous.

The Poor Man's Chance

One day when in the midst of the jungle, and when the wintry winds had whipped the brown leaves off the scrub oaks, Casper Turner saw away in the distance a yellowish, whity substance that attracted his attention. He reined in and investigated. He wrapped a few ounces of the substance in his handkerchief, why he hardly knew at the time, but as he drove home he recalled about the Agricultural Department in Washington, where experts analyzed soils for farmers, and, at a venture, he decided to forward the stuff.

He had almost forgotten what he had done, when a letter from Washington came, telling him that the substance he sent was marl of superior fertilizing qualities, and having a commercial value of about thirty dollars a ton.

Casper Turner was neither well-educated nor a trained business man, but he had a good fund of saving common sense. He had in reserve three hundred dollars, and with it he bought an option to purchase the land within one year. This done, he went to the bank in the county town, explained the situation to the president, and within one month he had a company formed to work the phosphate beds, with himself as president and chief stockholder.

To-day, Casper Turner is rich and daily growing richer. The children who were to learn trades are now being fitted for the professions. Where does the credit lie? "Opportunity," you say? Well, since the Indians were driven out of New Jersey, men have been traveling that same road and seeing that same marl. The opportunity was there all the time, but it needed a Casper Turner to "chance" along and embrace it.

I think it will be a grand thing to make Mont-Lawn a monument to Dr. Klopsch.

Missions in the South*

THE hardest problem which has confronted our statesmen and educators since the Civil War has been the proper treatment of the freed slaves.

No one will claim that it has been met with perfect wisdom; but amid all the blundering and the bloodshed, somehow here and there a light hath shined, and the colored race has been slowly directed upward.

Mr. John E. White expresses the matter justly when he says: "This is profoundly a missionary problem, and it puts our Christianity to the test."

The characteristics of most primitive races are largely the same. They are superstitious, polygamous, cruel, thieving and untruthful. Women among them are despised and downtrodden.

The European nations seemed to emerge earliest into permanent and progressive civilization. In Asia, the Chinese and Hindu races attained to a remarkable development hundreds of years ago. Having reached a certain point, they have either remained stationary or have retrograded. The same thing is true of the greatest African race, the Egyptian. As for the other African races, most of them are still in the primitive darkness of untaught humanity. We see in them simply a picture of our own far-back ancestry—a thought which should give us deep charity for their shortcomings.

The negroes whom the earliest slave-ships brought over were scarcely more intelligent than the apes in their native forests; but, little by little, they were tamed and trained into more or less useful human beings. Since their emancipation, they have developed at an almost miraculous rate.

Yet even if they had remained in their native wilds, they might have been subject to slavery, for every powerful African tribe prided itself upon its ability to subdue and enslave its weaker neighbors when it so desired.

In 1860, the census revealed the fact that only about one-fourth of the Southern men owned slaves. A considerable proportion of that number owned but one slave each. There were only fourteen men in the whole South at that time who owned more than 500 slaves each, says Professor G. W. Dyer.

The noble and unselfish conduct of a very large proportion of the slaves during and just after the Civil War, revealed possibilities of a magnificent development. Says Mr. George S. Merriam: "Not a single act of vengeance was charged against them. A great part, probably the large majority, remained or soon went back to work for their old employers." Thomas Nelson Page says: "The white men of the South entrusted their families and all that they possessed to the guardianship of their slaves, while they themselves were absent on the field; and this trust was never violated."

But with freedom came also the vices which slavery had to a large degree restrained. Drunkenness, gambling, and a wholesale course of stealing, lying and licentiousness became the rule. All work was regarded as a form of slavery, and the results to be expected from the idleness of an ignorant people were everywhere apparent.

The growth from this low level of morality has necessarily been slow, but God has raised up leaders among the colored men and compassionate friends among the whites, until even the most critical of the black man's detractors have to admit his great progress.

But teachers and money are sorely needed among them. Let us give of ourselves and our substance freely to help this great cause.

Subscribers Pleased with Advertisements

IN GLANCING over our correspondence lately, we have been much struck with the decided difference in tone of many of our letters concerning advertisers. Time was when our mail contained a number of complaints concerning advertisers, which complaints when investigated were proved for the most part to be due to misunderstandings. But nowadays it is really an uncommon occurrence for us to receive a complaint concerning any advertiser who is using THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Of course, this naturally had to follow a rigid determination on our part to accept no advertisement upon which we could not rely. But it is nevertheless extremely gratifying to us to be able to state the fact, and it has a deeper significance in that our subscribers have at last come to understand how very essential advertisements are to a modern periodical. If we have published more advertisements lately than formerly, our observant readers must admit that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a better paper typographically than ever before. The type is more readable, the illustrations are clearer, the whole presentation is better defined.

Now it would be impossible to give you as good a paper as we do if we were to eliminate the advertisements. Not only would it be financially impossible to produce so well printed a CHRISTIAN HERALD, but the editorial section of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would not be nearly so large.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement. This guarantee does not apply to investment advertisements.

HEREDITY
Can Be Overcome in Cases.

The influence of heredity cannot, of course, be successfully disputed, but it can be minimized or entirely overcome in some cases by correct food and drink. A Conn. lady says:

"For years while I was a coffee drinker I suffered from bilious attacks of great severity, from which I used to emerge as white as a ghost and very weak. Our family physician gave me various prescriptions for improving the digestion and stimulating the liver, which I tried faithfully but without perceptible result.

"He was acquainted with my family history for several generations back, and once when I visited him he said: 'If you have inherited one of those torpid livers you may always suffer more or less from its inaction. We can't dodge our inheritance, you know.'

"I was not so strong a believer in heredity as he was, however, and beginning to think for myself, I concluded to stop drinking coffee, and see what effect that would have. I feared it would be a severe trial to give it up, but when I took Postum and had it well made, it completely filled my need for a hot beverage and I grew very fond of it.

"I have used Postum for three years, using no medicine. During all that time I have had absolutely none of the bilious attacks that I used to suffer from, and I have been entirely free from the pain and debilitating effects that used to result from them.

"The change is surely very great, and I am compelled to give Postum the exclusive credit for it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Israel's Wicked Queen*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

Ahab Covets Naboth's Vineyard

KING AHAB and Queen Jezebel had led the people away from the worship of the true God to the worship of idols; they had lowered the morals of the kingdom to such an extent that the majority fell from purity into licentiousness. Those who still adhered to the true worship were compelled to go into hiding in other provinces. As a result of the evil and wickedness famine was sent upon the land and the garden spot of Palestine became as a desert. This, however, did not turn the king and queen from their wickedness or deter them in their evil course. Their sinful desires were not yet satiated.

One morning Ahab looking out of his palace observed a very fine vineyard, which belonged to Naboth, the Jezreelite. Immediately the thought entered his mind that this vineyard would serve the purpose of a garden, as it was quite adjacent to his beautiful palace; so a desire came upon him to gain possession of it. He really did not need the vineyard, but like a spoiled child, who, no matter how many toys he has, wants more, Ahab was anxious to secure this further addition to his grounds. He sent for Naboth and told him that he was willing to pay for the vineyard in ingots of silver or else give a better one in return. Now Naboth had no desire to sell, in fact could not sell, for it was a law among the Jews that all property reverted to the original owners at the end of fifty years (Lev. 25: 11, 13, 28). We can easily understand Naboth's reply to Ahab when the latter asked him to sell: "Jehovah forbid it me that I should give the inheritance of my fathers unto thee." This ancestral inheritance was very dear to him for the memories that clung around it, apart from the law that forbade his parting with it. Ahab was sore displeased. As yet he had not really done anything sinful in his desire for Naboth's property, but he soon allowed the baseness in his nature to overcome him. He went into his palace and in sullen anger threw himself on his bed, turned his face to the wall and refused to eat. Under these conditions he was a sorry spectacle for his strong-willed wicked wife. When she stood by his bedside and asked him the cause of his gloom, we can fancy we hear the whimpering tones in which he told her about Naboth's refusal to sell him the vineyard. Likewise, we can fancy hearing the strident voice of Jezebel as she imperiously and sarcastically asked him: "Dost thou now govern the kingdom of Israel?" Then she bade him arise and eat bread and be merry, saying, with a wicked leer in her eyes, "I will give thee the vineyard of Naboth."

Jezebel's Wicked Plotting

From this it would seem that the evil one was actuating her, for she set about formulating charges against Naboth. She wrote letters to the rulers and sealed them with the king's own seal, asking them to proclaim a fast, because Naboth had cursed God and the king. When the rulers saw the king's seal they were compelled to do what was asked, so they proclaimed a fast, and Naboth was brought to trial. Jezebel herself procured the witnesses, those who for reward were willing to testify to whatever she desired to bring against the innocent man. The trial resulted in Naboth being condemned, and he was stoned to death. This evil triumph accomplished, the wicked queen went into the bed-chamber of her husband and told him to arise and take possession of the vineyard, because Naboth was dead. In this event Ahab had a legal right to the vineyard, because property to which there were no heirs reverted to the crown. Naboth left no heirs, his sons having perished with him (II. Kings 9: 26). God, from his heaven, was looking down, and no longer could he allow sin and wickedness to go unchecked. He called upon his prophet, Elijah, to go down into the vineyard and meet King Ahab there and deliver unto him this message of the Lord: "Thus saith Jehovah: In the place where the dogs licked the blood of Naboth shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine." Of Jezebel, also, the Lord spoke: "The dogs shall eat Jezebel by the rampart of Jezreel." On hearing the ominous words the king mourned greatly and took upon himself repentance and humbled himself before God. In his mercy, God, for a season, withheld the sword of judgment from Ahab, but the measure of Jezebel's iniquities was full and her fate was terrible, as we shall read.

The Selfishness of Ahab

The greatest drawback in the character of Ahab was his selfishness. This was his worst trait and the one which he allowed to master him and govern his actions. This selfishness grew up with him. As the son of a king he lacked nothing, he had plenty of everything, consequently the noxious weeds of self-indulgence and self-gratification flourished luxuriantly in the garden of luxury. He exercised no self-control over his inordinate tendencies, did not try to put a curb on his unlawful desires, but wanted to gratify his nature by obtaining whatever it craved. He thought he would have Naboth's vineyard for himself, but he had hardly time to walk through it before his title thereto was disputed by the Lord God and in such a way that the spot afterwards must have seemed to him as a place of blood. We are not told what was finally done with the vineyard, but we are inclined to believe that it was allowed to lie fallow, as nobody probably cared to cultivate or eat of the fruit.

Had Ahab not lain down in a sullen mood, angry at the refusal of Naboth to part with the vineyard, but had given right thought as to how he might acquire the property legitimately, it is possible the owner might have been influenced to part with it despite the ancestral law in regard to inheritances. But for his anger Ahab might have computed the number of years he would be permitted to hold the land until the Jubilee year and furthermore he might have been led to consider the number of years he had probably to live. (We may assume that he did not live more than three years after the vineyard incident.) It is not unlikely that Naboth would have consented to give him a life tenure of the land. But Ahab's sulkiness spoiled his chances—it even did more, as we have reason to suppose that it shortened his life. Scientists tell us that anger and morose moods and sullenness and gloom tend to waste energy and shorten life. Anger is always bad in itself under any circumstances. It always enervates and makes us less able to accomplish. The strength of a person is measured by the power of the things he subdues, hence composure is often the highest result of strength. Did you ever see a man receive a flagrant insult and only retort with mild words? Such a man is spiritually strong. Did you ever see a person in deep anguish standing immovable as if carved out of rock restraining his passions, mastering himself with stoical fortitude? Or have you seen some one bearing a heavy load or toiling under some hopeless trouble without murmuring or complaining or grumbling at the world? Such people exhibit the highest strength, they show a courage greater than that which made the Spartans famous. He who subdues his passions and curbs his desires, who resists the flattery of temptation, who under strong provocation restrains his temper and his tongue, who can display the magnanimity that makes him forgive injuries and forget wrongs, is a strong man, a spiritual hero of the highest type.

The Awful Fate of Jezebel

The wicked Queen Jezebel exercised no self-control. She was the daughter of a Zidonian king. The Zidonians were a powerful people, and Ahab's union with the daughter of their ruler might have brought him honor and prestige had the Zidonians and their king not been idol worshipers. Concerning the marriage of Ahab and Jezebel the Bible says: "And Ahab, the son of Omri, did evil in the sight of the Lord above all that were before him. And it came to pass, as if it had been a light thing for him to walk in the sins of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, that he took to wife Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians, and went and served Baal and worshiped him" (I. Kings 16: 30, 31). Ahab built a temple to Baal, and set aside a grove in which idol worship in its most licentious form was carried on. It was said that Ahab did more to provoke the Lord God than all the kings of Israel who went before him. There is no doubt that his wickedness was much the result of his alliance with Jezebel. Marriage mars or makes a man. The duplicity and falsehood of Ahab's queen remained with her to the end, to the last day of her life when, with painted face and a tiara of jewels on her head, she gazed through the latticed window upon the coming of Jehu, the newly anointed king of Israel. This woman of evil life had the terrible end which generally closes a career of unrepented sin. Jehu on seeing her ordered that she be thrown from the window, and his command was obeyed; her blood was sprinkled on the wall and her body trodden by horses and her flesh eaten by dogs, so that nothing was left save the skull and feet and hands, and these were gathered up and buried "because she was a king's daughter."

What to Learn from the Lesson

We can learn much from the lesson of Ahab and Jezebel. We should keep away from evil influences and bad companions. Had Ahab not allied himself with Jezebel and turned away from the worship of the true God his life would have been different. He was weak and his wife was strong in evil, therefore she exercised an evil influence over him. We should never enter upon falsehood and deceit, for even in this world these vices bring their own punishment. Sooner or later they are discovered, and those who practise them are scorned and shunned by all who are upright. We must be careful not to seek revenge for real or fancied wrongs. Some may reckon revenge sweet, but they will find themselves sadly mistaken. Don't follow the example of Jezebel in this sin. There is only one kind of revenge which is sweet, and it is that mentioned in the Bible—"Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, that despitefully use you and persecute you."

Book No. 9
"The Curtiss Poultry Book" covers 226 subjects, written by a pioneer in the poultry business. Six indispensable formulas for feed mixing.

Here are other folks' experiences—how they got more results for less work. You can do as they did. Pick out your books right now. Perhaps never before has such a valuable and easily read set of farm books been published—you need them—get them at once. See descriptions in left-hand column.

These nine books, printed from large type, and easy to read, are crowded with boiled-down facts that you can use every day. They tell not only how others have raised poultry and eggs, and made money at it, but how you can do it, too—how you can get bigger profits from your cows, whether you have two or twenty—how you can be sure you're getting a square deal in a horse trade—how you can grow more corn from every hill—how you can make a 10 x 20 garden yield as much as most folks get from a 20 x 40 plot.

All these things and many more are told. These books are the cream of the life experience of experts. They are absolutely authentic—or Farm Journal wouldn't offer them to you.

Get your set now; profit by all these other folks' efforts. They're enjoying the results of their money-saving efforts—so can you. Just use the coupon below.

Why You Need Farm Journal

Farm Journal is printed for those who went to know about flowers and vegetables, poultry, dogs and other pets, horses and cows, crops, good roads, building and odd jobs, improvements around the place. It has home doctoring hints, dressmaking helps, ideas for an evening's fun, cookery suggestions—why, there isn't anything worth while it doesn't have.

Farm Journal is the only paper of its kind in the world. It helps the amateur and the expert. It helps the man or woman who cultivates a square rod or a square mile.

Farm Journal believes in clean fence rows, sharp tools, and the hundred and one little conveniences that go to make a happy family. Take advantage of this offer now.

Influence of a Great Passion*

PERHAPS the man nearest our own time who has had the greatest passion for soul-saving was Dwight L. Moody. Night and day, East, West and across the sea, his one thought seemed to be, "How can I win over more hearts to the Saviour?" It was the burning emotion forever alight in the inmost recesses of his nature.

Among the thrilling records of the saints and martyrs of old, we find many examples of this thirst after God, which reveals itself usually in the desire to win all others unto him.

There was the great Bernard who preached among the barbarous Germans the necessity of a crusade to save the holy city. He spoke in Latin, but such was his divine enthusiasm that vast audiences that could not understand a word that he uttered, and knew only his general purpose, were moved to tears, and to the high resolve to share in the sacred enterprise he championed.

"It was through the might of a great and noble passion," says Dr. G. P. Nichols, "that Luther defied Rome; that Gustavus Adolphus poured out his great heart for his country's freedom; that the Puritans fought at Naseby, and founded a New England on these inhospitable shores; that James Watt searched out the secrets of steam; that Arkwright arrived at the working of the spinning machine; that Columbus found a new continent; that Harvey discovered the circulation of the blood; that Galileo became persuaded of the earth's revolution around the sun."

In our own day, we have seen Robert Peary seek again and again for the home of the pole-star, only to be baffled, until at last time and tide favor him, and the wisdom born of experience aids him, and he finds that which had so long eluded his search.

Emerson has said in effect in one of his essays that when a man is selected to do an important work in the world, the Lord "overloads him with bias." In other words, he is likely to be unbalanced; the prevailing desire of his nature dwarfs every other until he becomes, as we often say, "a man with one idea."

Such men are often more or less disagreeable socially, but they are often also the pioneers of great forward movements.

Charles Rhenius, the great missionary to India in the early nineteenth century, was on fire with the zeal to save the heathen. Hall and Newell, full of the same sacred flame, wrote their famous pamphlet, the Conversion of the World, filled it with their own enthusiasm, and a spark from it enkindled the soul of Dr. John Scudder, who became the first medical missionary to India. Eight of his sons and many more of his grandchildren have devoted themselves to his work there, with the same fiery earnestness.

Professor Bruce of Glasgow University wrote thus of our beloved Phillips Brooks: "Our great preachers take into the pulpit a bucket full or half full of the word of God, and then, by the force of personal mechanism, they attempt to convey it to the congregation. But this man is a great water main, attached to the everlasting reservoir of God's truth and grace and love, and streams of life pour through him to refresh every weary soul."

He, too, had the divine passion for saving men from sin. So had John Wesley. So had Whitefield and Finney. The world would have been a poor place without these passion-filled emissaries of the Most High. Let us imitate their consecration and their lofty devotion.

Cordially Approves the Plan

LAKEVIEW, MICH., January 16, 1911.

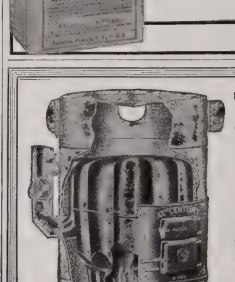
DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I like very much the plan that the Children's Home be the monument for our dear Dr. Klopsch. We can each reader add every year to the glory of the monument.

MRS. ELIZA BUSHLEY.



Insist upon this old reliable Kingsford's package. Do not accept an inferior substitute when Kingsford's Corn Starch gives unequalled results in cooking and costs no more.

Kingsford's makes good corn starch desserts because of its absolute purity. For over sixty years it has been made by an exclusive process, requiring weeks of careful preparation—while ordinary corn starches can be made in a few days. It is so fine and delicate that it readily takes the full flavor of every kind of seasoning.

DR. Ridpath gives the history of every religion of mankind, and shows the slow but sure progress that has been made from Paganism to Christianity, from darkness to light. The customs and habits of people, the development of their science and literature and art, the growth of religion and education form a very vital part of this history, and that which gives the work its lasting popularity is the wonderfully beautiful and fascinating style in which it is written. To read this work is not only to increase one's fund of knowledge, but to improve the literary style in which we write or speak, and to expand and develop the mental powers.

EVERY American citizen should know the history of his own country and of the world to intelligently perform his full duty as a citizen in the government of this Nation. How else are we to judge of the great national questions that crowd upon us for decision except by some knowledge of the past? For the answer read the history of mighty Babylon, or of imperial Rome as a kingdom, then as a republic, and finally as an empire, and familiarize yourself with her growth, development and decay. Then, when you know the cause of the rise and downfall of empires and nations, will you be able to intelligently discuss and decide the great questions that are pressing everywhere for attention.

RIDPATH takes you back to the dawn of history, long before the pyramids of Egypt were built; down through the romantic troubled times of Chaldea's grandeur and Assyria's magnificence; of Babylonia's wealth and luxury; of Grecian and Roman splendor; of Mohammedan culture and refinement; of French elegance and British power; of American patriotism and religious freedom, to the dawn of yesterday. He covers every race, every nation, every time, and holds you spellbound by his wonderful eloquence. Nothing more interesting, absorbing and inspiring was ever written.

RIDPATH throws the mantel of personality over the old heroes of history. Alexander is there—patriot, warrior, statesman, diplomat, crowning the glory of Grecian history. Xerxes, from his mountain platform, sees Themistocles, with three hundred and fifty Greek ships, smash his Persian fleet of over a thousand sail, and help to mould the language in which this paragraph is written. Rome perches Nero upon the greatest throne on earth, and so sets up a poor madman's name to stand for countless centuries as the synonym of savage cruelty; Napoleon fights Waterloo again under your very eyes, and reels before the iron fact that at last the end of his gilded dream has come. Bismarck is there—gruff, overbearing, a giant pugilist in the diplomatic ring, laughing with grim disdain at France, which says "You shall not." Washington is there, four-square to all the winds," grave, thoughtful, proof against the wiles of British strategy and the poisoned darts of false friends; clear-seeing over the heads of his fellow-country-men, and on into another century—the most colossal world-figure of his time!

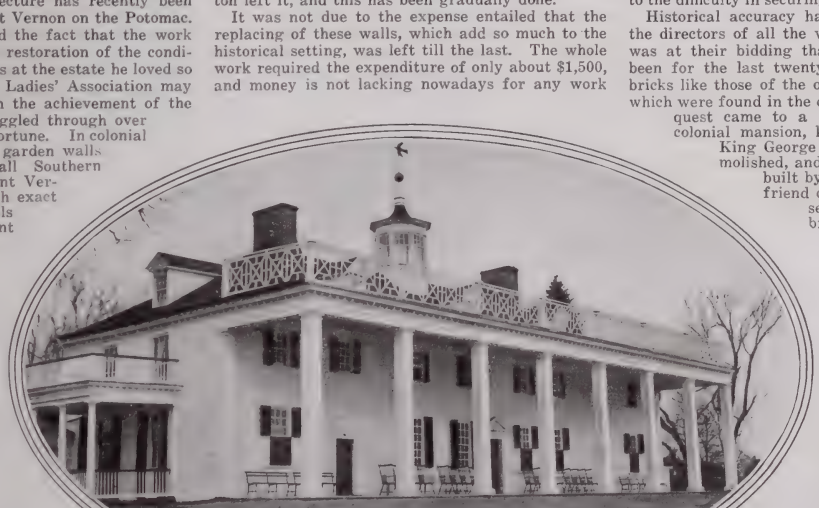
The Restoration, Showing Rebuilt Walls



The Entrance to the Estate

Rear View of the Mansion, After Restoration

THE RESTORATION OF MOUNT VERNON

AN IMPORTANT and interesting undertaking in landscape architecture has recently been carried out at Mount Vernon on the Potomac. he interest centres round the fact that the work w finished completes the restoration of the condi- ns of Washington's times at the estate he loved so ell. The Mount Vernon Ladies' Association may w congratulate itself on the achievement of the d for which it has struggled through over lf a century of varying fortune. In colonial nes red brick lawn and garden walls re characteristic of all Southern anor houses of the Mount Ver- n type. To replace with exact plicates the fallen walls this kind on the Mount ernon estate, has ng been the keen de- e of those interested the restorations ere. This has now en accomplished, and e new old-walls, hich flank the man- n on either side and rm a conspicuous ature of the lawn at stretches away ward the river, stand ain as they were ilt under the direc- n of our first Presi- nt. The original lls were in an excel- t condition at the time of ashington's death, but suc- ssive heirs allowed them to fall o decay. When the Mount rnon Ladies' Association acquired o hundred and thirty-seven acres of eight thousand which formerly comprised estate, there was nothing left but the ndations. These public-spirited women, who pped in and saved the historic spot for the nation, d hard work to raise by subscription the $200,000 quired to make the purchase, and for a time after y took title to the property, they had to content maelves with minor improvements. However, it s always been their ambition to restore everything about the estate to the condition in which Washington left it, and this has been gradually done.

It was not due to the expense entailed that the replacing of these walls, which add so much to the historical setting, was left till the last. The whole work required the expenditure of only about $1,500, and money is not lacking nowadays for any work that may be contemplated about this Mecca of the American people. Contributions need only be asked for to be obtained. The small fees paid by visitors yield an annual income of more than $40,000—a sum which is ample for the maintenance of the mansion and estate. The long delay was due solely to the difficulty in securing the proper kind of bricks.

The Mansion, With the Restorers' Work Completed

Historical accuracy has been the watchword of the directors of all the work on the estate; and it was at their bidding that the superintendent has been for the last twenty-five years searching for bricks like those of the original walls, remnants of which were found in the débris. Last year the long quest came to a successful close. An old colonial mansion, known as Society Hill, in King George County, Virginia, was demolished, and this structure, which was built by Colonel Thornton, a close friend of Washington, yielded the searcher a great quantity of bricks, evidently imported from the old country, and identical in size and color with those at Mount Vernon. It was a long and laborious job to clean and transport them to the estate, but this was finally done, and the long-missing walls are back in place, with copings fashioned from original Washington bricks, which were rescued from the old foundations. English ivy has been planted along the rebuilt walls, and when the azaleas come again in spring and the brickwork is veiled with green, the old mansion of the United States' national hero will look as it did in those years when it was his much-loved home.

The most extensive of the restorations are the so-called "screen walls," whose function was to hide from the sight of guests on the lawn the inevitable domestic activities carried on around the kitchen, the smoke-house and the spinning-house. Almost as interesting as the screen walls are the "Ha-Ha," or terrace walls. These are depressed below the level of the sloping lawn to divide one

A SERMON BY

Rev. J. D. Burrell, D.D., LL.D.*

GOD'S HAND IN OUR HISTORY

TEXT—Ps. 147:20

WE pay tribute to-day to the memory of George Washington: "First in war, first in peace, and first in the heart of his countrymen." His patriotism was buttressed by his piety. No man ever recognized more clearly, in personal and national affairs, the hand of a sovereign God. On resigning his commission as Commander-in-Chief of the Revolutionary army he said: "A man must be worse than an infidel who does not see the divine goodness or has not gratitude enough to acknowledge it." On taking the Presidential chair he said: "No people can be more bound than we to acknowledge and adore the invisible Hand which conducts the affairs of men."

It is my present purpose to show that Washington was right. All through our history runs a golden thread of manifest Providence. As we trace it we shall see how singularly God has overruled the blunders of men to the promotion of his glory in our national life.

The Course of Empire

The story of these blunders begins as far back as 150 A.D., when Ptolemy, the geographer of Alexandria, made his famous map of the world. At that time the known world was merely a fringe of countries around the Mediterranean; and had Ptolemy confined himself to these his map would have been tolerably correct; but he undertook to guess at the regions beyond, and naturally he guessed wrong. One of his errors was in bringing the western coast of Europe and the eastern coast of Asia so near together as to make it appear a small matter for an adventurous mariner to cross the intervening seas.

Now it so happened that a thousand years later this map fell into the hands of Columbus, who dreamed over it and was misled. "If India lies so near to the westward," he said, "why may I not find it?" Whereupon he manned his caravels and ventured forth. See yonder the Pinta leading the little fleet through the Pillars of Hercules!

> Westward the course of empire takes its way;
> The first four acts already past,
> The fifth shall close the drama with the day;
> Time's noblest offspring is the last.

This voyage of Columbus was a fool's errand. He hoped to discover the fabulous Northwest Passage; and the fact that he found something better was due to the overruling hand of Providence; for it is true of nations as of men, "There's a Divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them how we will." Had the adventurous mariner foreseen the interminable leagues which lay before him he would doubtless have tarried at home. Days, weeks, a weary month passed by without a sight of land. A mass of seaweed floating by suggested a change of course; but Columbus wrote in his log, "This day we sailed westward." A flock of paroquets flew past, and the sailors, ready for mutiny, demanded the shifting of the helm; but again the captain wrote in his log, "This day we sailed westward." At length a thornbush, borne northward on the Gulf Stream, convinced him that land lay to the south, and he shifted the helm accordingly.

What Might Have Happened

That changed the course of history. Had the ships continued on their westward course, they would have touched on the coast of Florida. What then? A Spanish settlement and a Papal civilization. For the power behind that enterprise was Rome. It was undertaken in payment of a vow to the Virgin Mary, was stimulated by the Papal benediction and carried to a conclusion under the patronage of the Spanish crown. As it was, Columbus landed on San Salvador, and planted the red cross banner, saying: "I give the new world to Castile, to Jesus and Mary!" But the new world was not thus to be divided between Castile, Jesus and Mary. God had better things in store for our country than the type of civilization which is seen in Spain, Mexico, and South America. The people who were to effect a permanent settlement in America must be prepared for it in a far different environment. "Man proposes, but God disposes." A hundred years must pass before a permanent settlement can be effected—a hundred years of "sifting out the hearts of men."

The sifting process began with an historic "blunder" made by Luther, when he nailed his Ninety-five Theses to the chapel door at Wittemberg. Pope Leo said it was a blunder; so did Charles V; so did the Elector of Saxony. In any case it awoke the thunders of the Reformation and kindled fires of persecution which were not to be quenched for two hundred years. The Husbandman came to his threshing-floor with fan in hand and began to purge it, reserving the finest of the wheat for the fallow ground of America. There must be men of courage, intelligence, industry and independent conviction. To this end they must be tried in tempests of fire and blood; for they were to stand forth as haters of tyranny, lovers of freedom, purged of superstition and devoted to God.

The result was precipitated by a blunder on the part of James I of England, in demanding that his subjects should conform to the customs of the Established Church. It so happened that up at Scrooby, on the borders of Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, there was a company of humble people who had a foolish fondness for religious independence: and in this they were aided and abetted by their pastor, John Robinson. For a while they patiently endured wrong and oppression, but at length resolved to flee. This also was a mistake; for the English Revolution was coming on, when Cromwell should marshal his Roundheads for the fray. By all that is sacred in courage and steadfastness, these men of Scrooby should have remained in England and fought it out; but, though martyrs in patience, they were not the stuff that heroes are made of. But whither should they flee? Holland alone, of all the nations, had fought the conflict of civil and religious freedom to a finish. For almost a century her paltry three millions had been arrayed against Rome and her allies; and they were now prepared to offer a refuge to the oppressed of the whole earth.

The Coming of the Pilgrims

The Pilgrims came to Holland in 1608. They had scarcely landed before the war ceased through the proffer of an armistice by Philip III. The arms and energies of Holland, thus suddenly released, were forced to seek other avenues of investment. So it happened that the Half-Moon sailed in 1609, and was followed in quick succession by other shiploads of adventurers turning their faces to the New World. The men of Scrooby, however, remained in Holland for a dozen years, learning the lessons of freedom which the Dutch people had mastered in the stern school of war. In 1620 they also sailed, in the Mayflower. In midocean they elected John Bradford governor of their hypothetical colony and drew up a constitution beginning and ending with the words, "In the name of God, Amen." All the world knows how they landed at Plymouth in the autumn of that year, and proceeded at once to the establishment of a free commonwealth.

Meanwhile the Dutch settlement on Manhattan Island was growing and prospering. In 1664 there were three hundred houses there and fifteen hundred people. Then Governor Peter Stuyvesant, "the honest despot," made his blunder. Colonel Nichols had appeared in the bay with four British ships and four hundred and fifty men demanding the surrender of New Amsterdam. After a week's delay the governor, deeming discretion the better part of valor, yielded; and New Amsterdam became New York.

The Puritans

But this inglorious surrender was not without its compensations. The Dutch, thus scattered, have never segregated in our country since that day. The Puritans of New England, the Quakers and Germans of Pennsylvania, the Cavaliers of Virginia and the Carolinas, the Huguenots of Louisiana and elsewhere, have flocked by themselves; but the Dutch have mingled with the general throng and allowed their heroic, slow-flowing, liberty-loving blood to mingle with the life current of the nation. You may trace the influence of other nationalities which have kept themselves apart, but of the Dutch you cannot say, Lo here, or, Lo, there. The presence of the Puritans in America is as obvious as a river, while that of the Dutch is like the falling of the dew, which shows itself only in the refreshing of the landscape. Wherefore let us be grateful for the English occupation of New York, whereby the thrift and industry and republican simplicity and religious devotion of the Holland settlers were scattered abroad to permeate, unseen but always felt, the institutions of our country.

But the English were not destined to have a perpetual tenure of America. Their time for blundering came in the reign of unhappy George III. Oh, that blessed stamp act! Blessed thrippence on a pound of tea! Blessed Boston tea-party! Blessed Hessian mercenaries! Blessed Independence Bell! Blessed, bloody Valley Forge! And, above all, blessed be God, who maketh the foolishness as well as the wrath of men to praise him!

The English king had no thought of alienating his American colonies, only of sternly chastising and correcting them. The Continental Congress had no thought of establishing an independent commonwealth, only of exacting from the motherland the recognition of certain "inalienable rights—among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." George Washington had no thought of being a rebel, only of championing the just demands of a loyal people. But while Jehu starts the chariot, God holds the reins.

An Undreamed of Development

Our fathers never dreamed of such a country as we have to-day. They were well within the nineteenth century before they abandoned the idea of a Republic limited to a stretch along the Atlantic coast. The Mississippi might have been our Western boundary until now, but for a "blunder" made by Napoleon when his exchequer was low. In casting about for means to carry out his plans of European conquest, it occurred to him that certain lands in the Western part of America might be disposed of. They were worth little to him, and it was doubtful if France could permanently defend them. A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush. They were offered to our Government for the paltry sum of fifteen million dollars. It was a great bargain. There are single blocks in some of our Western cities that would bring more money to-day. But the proffer gave rise to a prolonged controversy in our national councils. There was a grave difference of opinion as to the wisdom of the transaction. However, the "Louisiana Purchase" was made, and an area larger than the thirteen original colonies came into our possession, and with it the control of the Mississippi River, our great artery of commerce. Thus the Republic was extended along its southern borders to the western sea.

The Empire of the Northwest

But the vast territory of the Northwest was still disputed ground. The Hudson's Bay Company determined to hold it for England in the interest of the Indians and the fur trade. The authorities at Washington were indifferent, deeming it a wild and unproductive land. Then Marcus Whitman, a missionary among the Indians of Oregon, hearing that definite plans were on foot to establish the British claim, determined to reach Washington, if possible, and appeal to Congress. In vain did friends endeavor to dissuade him. "It would be a great blunder," they said; "how could you ever cross the Rockies? The winter is setting in and you would freeze to death; nor would you accomplish anything if you should reach your destination. What does Congress care for the country out here?" But, despite all protestations, he set forth from Walla Walla, confronting dangers and difficulties incredible, and reached Washington in time to make his appeal. The Government acted and the Northwest Territory was saved: a country thirty-six times the area of Massachusetts was added to our national domain, and Old Glory waved over a magnificent Republic stretching from the Great Lakes to the Gulf and from ocean to ocean.

Was the labor worth the pains? Was it worth while, from the view-point of righteousness, to add acre to acre in a country over which the curse of slavery held sway?

Our Congress, while deprecating he thought of secession, was still oquent in its asseverations that the acred institution of slavery was not be meddled with. A manifest under. But the logic of events ould not be resisted. In due time the mancipation Proclamation was is- ed "as a war measure" and against he protest of many distinguished atriots. It was heralded by multi- ides as a political mistake. Let it st at that. The foolishness of men oftentimes the wisdom of God. he war ceased. We were a free peo- at last. It was the Lord's doing nd marvelous in our eyes.

Time passed and we were driven y motives of humanity into another ar, in which the civilization of the uritans was arrayed against that of pain. It would not have occurred ut for a colossal blunder made by eneral Weyler, who by cruel oppres- on brought the people of Cuba to he last extremity of despair. Had e refrained from interposing in their behalf it would have been an unpar- onable sin. But interposition meant ore than we knew or contemplated. ur thoughts went no further than he deliverance of the downtrodden. hat, however, was not to be wrought ithout the accomplishment of an ul- erior purpose, which God seemed to e entertaining without us. In the rogress of the war it became nec- ssary, as a counter-irritant, to attack pain in her Oriental possessions. hus the Philippines fell to our lot nd, for better or for worse, we ave these islands on our hands. Expan- on is an accomplished fact. East- ard the star of empire now takes s way.

It is for us to say what the result hall be. We are a Christian nation nd barbarism is at our doors; we annot evade the responsibility of the situation. The hands of the Philip- ines are reaching forth and they are alling, "Come over and help us!"

It behooves us to remember these hings. Washington was right: "A an must be worse than an infidel ho does not see the divine goodness n our national affairs or has not the ratitude to acknowledge it." Our ratitude can best be shown by de- otion to our fathers' God. Truly he ath not dealt so with any nation. hough our fathers pursued their ay blindly and with much stumbling, od never withdrew his guidance: he pillar of cloud went before them ntil they entered on their promised ossession, a large and wealthy place mong the nations of the earth.

It is related that when Columbus, n his historic voyage, was approach- g the shores of the Western World, he flickering light was dimly seen hrough the darkness by one of his ailors. "It may be," said Columbus, hat the faithful wife of some fisher- an is waving a torch to guide him n his homeward way." The cen- uries have passed and to-day a col- ssal figure, "Liberty Enlightening he World," stands with uplifted orch in the harbor of New York. or liberty read Christianity; and lace in her hand instead of the torch he uplifted cross; then shall we be- old the mission of America to the orld. GOLD-RIMMED SPECTACLES

By Rev. J. M. FARRAR, D.D.*

DID you see that little girl? She is a great burden-bearer. If you had a pair of the new gold-rimmed spectacles you would be astonished to see what she is carrying. You have not heard of these new golden spectacles? You have heard of the X-ray, that strange light that enables you to see a stout man's bones and to look clear through some people who think they know how to keep a secret. The new eye-glasses enable us to see what people are carrying.

The old eye-glasses were, "Set a thief to catch a thief." If any one is a thief he is the one who can see a thief and know all the mean things he is doing. But there are so few mean people that it does not pay to make these old eye-glasses. A new eye-glass firm has been organized, and is called, "The Junior Congregation Eye-glass Company, Unlimited." The new eye-glasses are, "Set a burden-bearer to see a burden-bearer." If a boy or girl has learned to bear burdens for others, that is the boy or girl who can see all who are burden-bearers. We call them gold-rimmed because gold is pure.

IF YOU have these gold-rimmed spectacles you will be able to see that little girl with burdens on both shoulders, burdens on top of her head, burdens in both arms. Each finger carrying a burden as large as a big man would feel able to carry on his shoulders. This little girl read in her Five-inch Library: "Bear ye one another's burdens." Then she began to ask, "Can I bear any one's burdens?" At first she thought that she could only carry some tiny burden for mother. She could carry this burden and then added to it some other person's burden. She soon found that she was able to carry every one of them. When she took those burdens she found that she could run faster, skip the rope oftener, dance better, sing better, and that her school work seemed to be lighter.

I AM going to tell you a story. Here it is:

"Bear ye one another's burdens and so fulfil the law of Christ." Lena Graves read this in her Five-inch Library. She determined to help others to bear their burdens. In the morning, after washing her face, she put on the new spectacles.

Before going down stairs she resolved that through the day she would say every kind word she could honestly utter. She began to use them at the breakfast table. "How light these muffins are!" she exclaimed, as she broke one open on her plate. Mrs. Graves looked pleased. The family was apt to be critical, and she was dreading remarks upon the coffee, which was not quite so clear as usual.

LENA'S suggestion took effect. The family tasted the muffins, and were unanimous in their praise. "Light as a feather," declared father. "Mother's muffins are always good," said Will. Her mother's pleased and brightened face was a revelation to Lena. The talk flowed on in pleasant channels, without the usual grumbling.

Her next opportunity came as she started for school. Bridget was scrubbing the front steps, and the young girl paused to say, "You did up my lace collar beautifully, Bridget. I really believe it looks better than when it went to the laundry."

"That's a good thing, sure," answered Bridget, with a happy smile. And as Lena vanished, for some reason, Bridget went back and scrubbed a corner of the upper step which she had passed over slightingly.

After the algebra class Lena lingered for a moment at the teacher's desk to say, "That explanation of yours helped me to see into this seventh example perfectly. Thank you." The pale, discouraged teacher looked up, surprised. She had a sudden refreshed feeling, such as always came when a bunch of violets was dropped on her desk. Not many words of appreciation came her way, and the joy went through the rest of the school's routine.

AND so it went on through the hours of the eventful day. At its close, Lena felt a rare happiness she had never known. The next morning mamma was delighted to find that Lena had made her own bed, and tidied up the room. Then when mamma went to her room she found her bed made to a perfect spread and the dusting all done. Mamma fainted. But she "came to," feeling better, and has not had a sick headache for three months.

Then came a new world into Lena's vision. She saw boys and girls, men and women, as she had never seen them before. So many of them were carrying burdens for other people! The old world seemed new. The old, sad world was glad. Her new world was not bad.

Lena was a member of "The Junior Congregation Eye-Glass Company." You could often hear her say, "New eye-glasses for sale. Price: the life, suffering and death of Christ."

* Pastor First Reformed Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. TEXT: Gal. 6: 2.

The Gift of Public Prayer

THE minister's wife told the story herself. We had been talking of the difficulty of learning to pray aloud in our church meetings. She smiled thoughtfully over her knitting.

"It happened while we were living in a certain Western city," she said. "I, being the dominie's wife, was vice-president of the Women's Missionary Society. One day, when we were to hold our monthly meeting, I had an idea that the president would not be on hand; and I was so afraid that I'd have to preside and open the meeting with prayer—a thing I'd never done in my life!—that I deliberately dallied over my hat and my veil until I knew I was quite late. Then I went down to the church. The meeting was well under way, and the president was in the chair. I felt ashamed of myself; but I felt more ashamed than ever when, after the meeting had ended, Mrs. Jones told me what had happened."

She spread her knitting out on her knee and looked it over critically, head on one side; then she chuckled:

"The president, mind you," she went on, "was one of our most prominent church workers; but, like me, she felt that she simply could not offer prayer in a meeting. She had opened this meeting by getting up and offering her resignation. The pastor—my husband—had said from the pulpit last Sunday that he had heard that there was a society in that church that opened its meetings without prayer, and he was ashamed of it. Because of his remark she felt that she was not fit to be any longer president of the Missionary Society, because—'I simply cannot pray out loud,' she said.

"When she was through, there was a moment's dismayed silence. Then one of the ladies spoke up: 'Madam President, perhaps we are all to blame! I move that we have a prayer meeting right now, and every one of us offer prayer.' And didn't they get down on their knees then and there, and didn't every woman in that room pray aloud! And most of them, remember, had never so much as peeped in a meeting! But the best part of it all, and the part that shamed me most, was when one woman, who had always been supposed to be rather light-minded—no soul to spare, you know—said in a shaky voice, 'O God, help us to be as little afraid of each other as we are of you!' Wasn't that a fine prayer? When Mrs. Jones told me that, I was ashamed through and through, and sorry that I'd missed my chance, and still a wee bit relieved that I'd escaped—all three feelings rolled into one."

She paused for a moment, and some one asked, "Did it last?"

"Bless you, yes!" she replied. "Those women are praying yet, out there. It waked up the society, and it hasn't gone to sleep since. But I haven't told you all of it. On the way home from the meeting I stopped, as I always did, to tell old Aunty Perkins what had happened. She was a shut-in, and she did so love to hear about everything. When I had told her, she said, 'Of course you prayed?'

"And I said, 'Oh no; I wasn't there. But even if I had been there I wouldn't have prayed aloud. I couldn't! I haven't the gift of prayer, Aunty Perkins.'

"Then the old lady looked at me over her spectacles and answered me. 'My dear,' she said quietly, 'you haven't the gift because you haven't asked for it. God gives good gifts to those who ask him for them. You'd better ask, right away!'"

The mistress of the house knitted for a silent moment; but all of us sitting there with her knew at last how she had gotten her power in prayer. She had asked for it as Aunty Perkins had told her to do.

Thousands Dying of Famine

Another Remittance of $10,000 Cabled by "The Christian Herald" for Relief, in Response to Renewed Appeals by the Missionari

A Crowd of Famine Refugees in the District Around Chin-kiang, Where 25,000 Are Now Assembled

THIS week another remittance of $10,000 has been forwarded by cable through our State Department in Washington from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD China Famine Fund to the Relief Committee in the field. This is the fourth remittance which this journal has cabled through the State Department since the opening of the Relief Fund, making the total sum cabled to date $26,000. Although the contributions have not yet reached that total, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in view of the immediate need, has followed its usual custom of anticipating the gifts of its readers to the extent of several thousand dollars.

Shanghai dispatches received during the week state that the situation in the famine provinces of Anhui and Kiang-su is steadily growing worse. Thousands are perishing of starvation; in many places there is not even an attempt made to bury the dead. "Nearly two million persons," the dispatch adds, "are in danger of death unless prompt relief is forthcoming." This frightful condition of affairs affords little hope that even the labors of the two large Relief Committees may be able to avert the impending calamity.

The whole civilized world is touched with sympathy for China and is now striving to hurry forward relief. Meanwhile, money cabled through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD saves precious time and gets relief most quickly to the field. A gift to China now, forwarded by cable, will do much more towards saving life and lessening suffering than any aid sent later could possibly accomplish.

A cable dispatch from Peking indicates that fears are entertained for the personal safety of the American missionaries. There is little doubt that these devoted workers, who are now distributing food to the multitudes of sufferers in and around Chin-kiang, are in real danger. The nature of this danger may be gathered from a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Rev. Mr. Longden, the chairman of our Interdenominational Missionary Committee at Chin-kiang, in which, after acknowledging the receipt of a remittance from our Relief Fund, he describes the almost hopeless character of the situation. He writes:

"China's condition seems almost desperate. The flood covers about the same district as that of four years ago."

Missionary Lobenstine says that the people, seeing starvation ahead, were so desperate that thousands of them banded themselves together and marched through the country, robbing every one who had any foodstuffs laid by, or who was reported to have any money. Dr. Cochrane, of the American Presbyterian Mission in Anhui, reports the famine as more severe than the last, two-thirds of the inhabitants of the districts from which he writes having been obliged to abandon their homes.

Another missionary writes that refugees from the North are being sent back again. He adds: "These people had put their all in boats and barrows and gone away. It is little wonder that there is threatened trouble when the tide is turned back. One's heart-strings get many a tug as one sees the pitiful barrow-loads going aimlessly hither and thither."

A Refugee Hut in the Famine District

Missionary Henry S. Ferguson, Yung-Chow-fu, writes: "One meets many refugees on the road; many are eating their last food now. The distress will deepen as the season advances. This is a famine which money will relieve, as the source of supply begins about fifty miles to the south."

Practically all the missionaries who have written on the subject agree that the death-roll of the coming month will be an appalling one, unless adequate relief can be afforded. Miss Ellmers, a missionary of the China Inland Mission, says: "The destitution around Antung is even worse than in the last famine. The people have not recovered from the last inundation and have no reserve to fall back upon. This is true of the greater part of the native population.

A worker of the North Presbyterian Missio states that in a territory of seven thousand squar miles in Anhui, between two and three millions ar affected by the famine, and of these over a millio are practically without anything to carry ther through the months between now and spring. I the magistracy of Huaiyuan alone, approximatel 175,000 people must be assisted or die.

Refugees are pouring into Chin-kiang. The off cials there are distributing soft boiled rice to abou 10,000 people daily. As in the last famine vas crowds of destitute are surging up and down th country in the hopeless quest for food, and the mi sionaries are simply overwhelme by the demands for aid which, ow ing to their very limited resource they are unable to satisfy. It i not surprising that there shoul be danger of violence from thes famine-stricken mobs, whose suf ferings have driven them to des peration. Chairman Longden add that his associates on the commit tee will see that money sent t them reaches the sufferers in th form of life-sustaining food.

The floods have destroyed larg areas in Hunan and Hupeh prov inces and great destitution i reported in these localities. A urgent appeal for help has com to the Chin-kiang missionarie from Chan-teh-fu, Hunan.

It may soon become a questio whether the plague or the famin will be the more terrible, shoul the former continue to sprea southward. While Europe is agi tated over the possible spread o the contagion to Western coun tries, and all civilized government are taking precautions to bar ou the plague by rigid quarantine China is fighting her double battl with grim stoicism. The pneumonic plague, stil raging with undiminished violence in several part of Manchuria, has already spread southward to th sea coast and Shantung. In the city of Harbin lately, 2,300 bodies of plague victims were burned i sixteen heaps and the remains buried in seven pits The authorities are considering the advisability o burning the whole Chinese section of the city, whic had a population of 10,000 and where 5,174 hav already died of the plague.

All contributions for famine relief should b addressed "China Famine Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York City." An additional list of contributions received will be found on the next page.

The Gospel in the Pulpit

IN REVIEWING the mass of letters which have come to us on the subject of the spiritual condition of individual churches throughout the country, one cannot fail to be struck with the vital importance of demanding, as a qualification for the practical work of the ministry, that the preacher himself should be a true Christian. That this is not always the case may be easily read between the lines in a number of the letters in question. Nor do we believe that they are written in any other than the kindliest spirit; for if the confession be made that the Gospel is neglected, it comes with reluctance and with an evidence of sincere regret. It is not difficult to understand the cause of the spiritual decline of a church whose pastor has not the one vital qualification which, above all others, makes him a true shepherd of his flock. But the trouble goes farther back. It can be traced to the teaching in some of our theological seminaries, which have let down the bars that mark the distinction between faith and unfaith, between the Gospel of Jesus Christ and the doubtful philosophies of the day. And it can be traced also to the course frequently followed by presbyteries and conferences in appointing as pastors, candidates who sometimes admit that they themselves are in the dark concerning Gospel truths and who are therefore incapable of leading others into the light. There cannot be a Gospel Church without a Gospel Pulpit!

A Relief Ship for China

OUR government has granted a relief ship for conveying a cargo of flour to famine-stricken China. It is our old relief ship, the Buford, which conveyed THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S cargo to Shanghai during the last great famine. We are now negotiating to send 10,000 sacks of flour. Time is precious. Your gift to China, sent now, will under God's blessing, be the means of saving human lives. Every pound of flour sent on the Buford will do double duty, as it will be equal to two pounds, at present famine prices in China. Every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should be represented in the cargo. Send in your contribution to the Relief Fund to-day.

When You Speak in Public

WHOEVER would speak in public to the satisfaction of an audience, must first of all know what he or she intends to say. To stand on a platform with ideas in confusion, words and sentences halting and entangled, and voice inadequate to reach the people in the back row of seats, is to meet the speaker's Waterloo. Women have so much practice in their clubs and federations nowadays that they know far better than their sisters did in an elder day how to speak so that they may be heard. Mr. Dwight L. Moody on a Northfield platform once thought fit to put the opening exercises of a devotional character into the hands of women, on an evening when the great auditorium was crowded. There were to be four consecutive prayers. The two women who first took part were inaudible to any in the congregation, their voices not rising much above an inarticulate murmur. When the turn of the third came, Mr. Moody, near whom she was seated, leaned toward her and said positively: "When you speak, speak so that you can be heard." His order was obeyed. He was right in demanding that one who attempts to lead a congregation should speak so as to be audible. Neither should any one in an assemblage of any kind make a speech linked together by conjunctions and punctuated by pauses both for breath and for new material.

Declamation, at all times a desirable study for boys, fell for a while in many of our schools into a neglected background. Our present educators are taking pains with elocution and with oratory, so far as our boys are concerned. Girls and women ought to cultivate the art of clear enunciation, giving every vowel and consonant its full value, and if speaking from a platform they should remember that it is not so much a volume of voice that is essential as an unhurried delivery and the right placing of emphasis. Always look straight before you and speak to the person at the far end of the room. Let the sides of the room take care of themselves. This is an especially good rule. As THE CHRISTIAN HERALD publishes every week sermons and addresses by the most accomplished platform and pulpit orators, it affords an excellent opportunity for young speakers to acquire a clear and fluent delivery by practising the reading of these sermons aloud. Nowhere could they find better material for declamation and certainly none that they might read with greater profit.

A Law That Could Work Two Ways

THERE is great jubilation in the ranks of the believers in the political principle of the "recall," over the case of Hiram C. Gill, mayor of Seattle, Wash., who was ousted from his office by its operation only a short time ago. These, together with the exponents of equal suffrage, are in high glee over the results of the first participation of women in the political affairs of the city. A year ago Mayor Gill was elected with a heavy plurality. The women of the State were given the ballot about four months ago, and it is claimed that they are largely responsible for the recent events. When it was made public in charges that Mayor Gill and his chief of police were in league with the vicious elements of the population and had even gone so far as to have dealings with a so-called "vice syndicate," the newly enacted recall law was put in operation. The resulting vote showed an overwhelming majority for the reform candidate.

Though this is a highly gratifying victory for the cause of righteousness and decency, as an example of the operation of the political principle it is of little value. If the accusations that were so persistently made during the campaign could be substantiated, the executive had been unfaithful to his oath and had brought himself under other laws that would have brought about his removal from office without establishing the precedent which this case does. No law is without the possibilities of misusage, and in connection with the recall law, that abuse might well be its enforcement when the only charge against the officeholder is unpopularity, due perhaps to most praiseworthy though misunderstood actions.

Washington's Secret of Power

GEORGE WASHINGTON never can be shut u in the history of the past. He does not belon to the eighteenth century. His personality does no lessen as the years advance. His influence is essen tially permanent. He is a man for the present need of the nation and of us its individual citizens. An this is the reason: Washington saw through th superficial things of his time into the profoun truth of all time. He recognized that truth an proclaimed it again and again. His own characte and work were shaped and controlled by it, and h sought to make it the controlling force in the new born nation. Acknowledgment of God's wisdom an power, trust in God's providence, obedience to God' law formed the foundation upon which Washingto began the building of the nation.

The Father of His Country knew that the grea achievement of his life was not his own. "If suc talents as I possess," he said, "have been called int action by great events, and those events terminate happily for our country, the glory should be ascribe to the manifest interposition of an overruling Prov idence. I was but the humble agent of favorin Heaven, whose benign influence was so often mani fested in our behalf, and to whom alone the prais of victory is due."

Washington was a mighty man of prayer. H knew that the only way in which man can reach u and take hold of the power of God is by prayer. A the pole of the trolley car reaches up to the wir overhead and draws down the power that makes th wheels move, so prayer reaches up and connects ma with the great source of power, and man then i mighty. One of the most interesting personal relic of Washington is a book of his prayers which h wrote out by hand, as a man would sit down an write intimate letters to a dear friend. The grea problems in national life, as in individual lives to day, need to have more of the power of prayer.

Washington, in a sense, was a seer and prophet His vision took in clearly the past and penetrate with equal clearness the future. The perspectiv of time is needed to bring to the events of a country' history their rightful significance; yet now, on hundred and twenty-two years after Washingto uttered them, these words can be repeated wit cumulated meaning and truth: "No people can b bound to acknowledge and adore the invisible Han which conducts the affairs of men more than th people of the United States. Every step by whic they have advanced . . . seems to have bee distinguished by some token of providential agency.

We tremble sometimes in these days for the per manency of our institutions as we see the corruptio and greed in political and business life, and we as one another, Whither are we drifting? What ca we do to preserve and exalt our nation? It will hel some to bring the Father of His Country into ou present-day councils and listen as he repeats hi serene and comforting words, first spoken in 1784 "It is, indeed, a pleasure, from the walks of privat life, to view in retrospect all the meanderings of ou past labors, the difficulties through which we hav walked, and the happy haven to which the ship ha been brought. Is it possible, after this, that it shoul founder? Will not the All-Wise and All-Powerfu Director of human events preserve it? I think H will." But Washington's vision of the future wa too clear to permit him to stop until he had uttere the prophecy which has found and is finding fulfil ment in many places: "He may, however, for som wise purpose of His own, suffer our indiscretion and folly to place our national character low in th political scale; and this, unless more wisdom and les prejudice take the lead in our government, will mos certainly happen."

What can we do? We can do as Washington dic We can reach up by prayer and take hold of God' almighty power. The government of this natio the conduct of public and private business, th moulding and exalting of national character, th preserving of our dearly bought and cherished insti tutions are things that can not be delegated entirel to others. They belong in a very distinct manne to each one of us. We know it, but are we attendin as fully and earnestly as may be to that part whic we are told must be performed after we have entere into our closet and shut the door?

San Francisco and the Exposition

THE completion of the Panama Canal is to be celebrated by a National Exposition in 1915. Competition of places asking for it narrowed down to New Orleans and San Francisco. For months there has been the most active canvass among the members of Congress by delegations from each of these cities. On February 1 the House of Representatives took up the Kahn resolution by a vote of 188 to 159, and then, after the resolution had been debated for an hour, it was finally passed by 259 to 43. Members from the coast and from the South followed with deep interest the reading of the roll-call. When Speaker Cannon announced that the House had decided to take up the Kahn resolution there was loud applause, which could be heard far into the corridors. Statesmen from the coast and the San Francisco boomers in the gallery made such a howl that the speaker had to rap for order. In the debate, when it was suggested that San Francisco would treat the Japanese with discourtesy in the event of the selection of that city, the representatives answered that they would go security that no such embarrassment would be permitted. There was the wildest enthusiasm in San Francisco as the voting was going on. Great crowds filled the streets around the bulletin boards and watched the progress of the fight. The buildings were decorated with flags, and most of the stores closed at four o'clock, so that all could join in the holiday. At four o'clock a great mass meeting was held at the Merchants' Exchange, but only a small portion of the crowd could find accommodation within its walls. It was in this same room last spring that seven million dollars was raised by a popular subscription for the proposed celebration. Of course it will be necessary for the Senate to take similar action, and the President must sign the bill before it shall become a law. The cutting of the Panama Canal is one of the greatest events of history and will be worthily commemorated in the great Exposition. God held his hand over one-half the world, hiding it from view until the time should be ripe, when he withdrew it and revealed it to the science, art, commerce and religion of the world. God hung two continents by a thin strip until human enterprise should cut a channel through it and make the two seas one and bring in closer touch the commerce of the world. And American enterprise is the hand employed by Providence to do this work. The Canal will very greatly shorten the distance by sea between the two great ports of New York and San Francisco. Best of all, this mighty piece of engineering will contribute incalculably toward the establishment of the kingdom of Christ in the earth. From the earliest times ships have been used for passengers and freight, for the advance of civilization and for the triumphs of the Cross.

And finding a ship sailing over unto Phenicia, we went aboard, and set forth. Now when we had discovered Cyprus, we left it on the left hand, and sailed into Syria, and landed at Tyre; for there the ship was to unlade her burden. (Acts 21: 2, 3.)

Most Beautiful Words

At the West Fifty-seventh Street branch of the Young Men's Christian Association in New York City the other evening there was a contest to decide the twenty-five most beautiful words in the English language. The prize, which was a flexible leather Standard Student's Dictionary, was won by Mr. John Shea, a lawyer. The words accepted were: "Melody, splendor, adoration, eloquence, virtue, innocence, modesty, faith, joy, honor, radiance, nobility, sympathy, heaven, love, divine, hope, harmony, happiness, purity and liberty." Twenty-one of the twenty-five words submitted by Mr. Shea were accepted. Sixty-three persons participated in the contest. It will be seen that the words that stood for the abiding things, faith, hope and love, were included in the twenty-five that secured the prize. The term Word expresses the most beautiful thought in the universe as it is used in the Scriptures to name the Saviour of mankind.

In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. . . . And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. (John 1: 1, 14.)

A New World Photographed

The powerful reflecting mirror of the Mount Wilson sixty-inch telescope has found and photographed a swirling mass of gases five hundred billion miles in diameter in the act of throwing off a new world. The photograph, which shows a spiral nebula, was taken by Professor G. W. Ritchey of the observatory staff. Professor Chamberlain of Chicago University and his colleagues recently evolved a theory of a spiral nebula whipping from its branches masses of gaseous matter to become its satellites. These, cooling, would become planets and, like the earth, furnish habitation for living beings. The spiral nebula in the Mount Wilson photograph is calculated to be 5,865,696,000,000 miles from the earth. The new world or sun which these scientists have photographed, pendent from the parent mass by one of the luminous branches, because of its density will be whipped clear. It is now one hundred and fifty billion miles from the central luminous area of the larger nebula. It may itself become an independent nebula and roam in that section of the firmament occupied by the spiral nebula from which it sprang. The omnipotent, omniscient, infinitely loving Creator, our Father, creates the worlds, sending them out and sustaining them in their harmonious rounds, and is also most deeply interested in the smallest event of the mortal lifetime of his humblest child. The marvelous discoveries of modern science only emphasize the words of the Psalmist:

The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth his handiwork. (Ps. 19: 1.)

Moving Pictures in Church

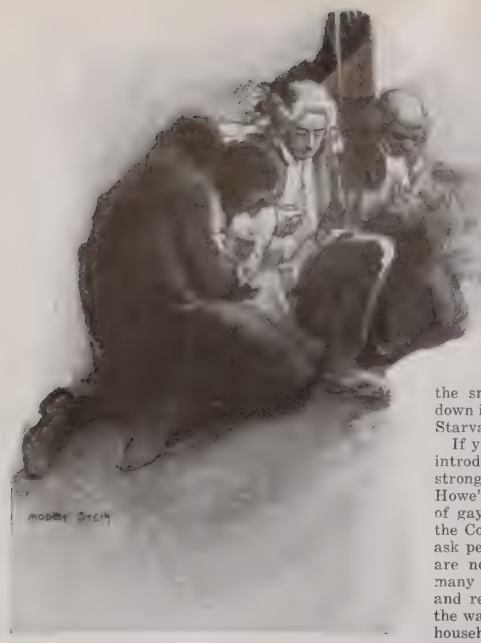
A Universalist preacher at Elgin, Ill., is reported to have declared that the church is no longer a gateway to heaven or the wall against hell, and that it is gradually becoming an educational institution. Stereopticon lectures are as much out of date, he says, as the old-style preaching about the fires of hell. He says the moving picture is the modern teacher. He has procured a motion picture machine and is arranging to have it installed in the church. He will conduct the shows like a theatre, charging a nominal admission. Some of the modern ministers have gone the limit to find a substitute for Gospel preaching, which they think has gone out of date. Others fortunately feel that no substitute can be found for the Gospel sermon, and they are the ones who are likely to have the audiences, the influence, and the success. Whatever advances there may be in the interpretation of science or the Scripture, there will never be any other Saviour to die, nor any other Gospel to be preached.

For I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ; for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. (Rom. 1: 16.)

Insurgents Threaten Juarez

Pascual Orozco, the second in command of the Mexican insurgents, moved against the city of Juarez. He sent the city word that if it did not surrender he would fire upon and capture it the next day. It was reported that the city was undermined with dynamite, and there was little left for it but surrender, and there was a panic, and emigration of many inhabitants. But Colonel Orozco's plans were interfered with by the presence upon the scene of General Rabago and his reinforcements. The insurgents had blown up the railroad track over which the Federal reinforcements were expected to travel, and the train was ditched; but Rabago's men built trenches and used the cars as breastworks and gave the insurgents battle. Colonel Rabago and his three hundred Federal troops marched into Juarez to its relief. Instead of capturing the city, as the insurgents had threatened, they are reported to have retired to Salamayuca, twenty-five miles south of the city, there to replenish their supply of ammunition and to await reinforcements. Meantime General Navarro's command of seven hundred Federal soldiers, around Chihuahua City, is reported making forced marches over land to the relief of the beleaguered city. Should Navarro succeed in getting into Juarez, it is very likely that the city will be able to withstand the insurgents' attack. There was some loss of life on both sides in the fighting around Juarez. The military contest is so close to our borders that Uncle Sam finds it necessary to keep both eyes open and a gun in hand to prevent the crossing of belligerents from one side or the other of the line. For the first time in history an aeroplane is to be used in actual warfare. General Leonard Wood, chief of staff, announces that the scouting service along the Rio Grande is to be supplemented by at least one biplane, which has been offered to the Aeronautical Service of the War Department by Robert J. Collier of New York. If it proves to be of value, others will be hurried to the Mexican border at once, so that by manœuvering above the Rio Grande American aviators will be able to keep track of revolutionists attempting to pass over the border either way. The vengeful discordant and murderous elements of the human heart have their expressions in the individual heart and in national and international conflicts. The failure of the assault upon Juarez by the insurgents thus far suggests the failures of such sieges in olden times.

Then Rezin king of Syria, and Pekah son of Remaliah king of Israel, came up to Jerusalem to war: and they besieged Ahaz, but could not overcome him. (II. Kings 16: 5.)



Co-operation of Churches

President Taft, in responding to the greeting of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ of America at the White House recently, commended the co-operative movement of the churches as teamwork for a better humanity. He declared that while it was true that the United States had no established religion, the Government was favorably inclined to the interests of every church, whatever its creed. He paid a sincere tribute to the value of the churches in blessing and building up the people of the Philippines. Christian unity and earnest co-operation are suggested by this figure:

For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office; so we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another. (Rom. 12: 4, 5.)

The Tory of Valley Forge

*By GILBERT PATTEN BROWN

"'Will you not kneel with the General and myself, Mr. Davis?' asked the chaplain."

IT WAS a cold day in February in the year of grace 1778, and the patriot army lay in winter quarters at Valley Forge. The bleak winds that swept across Cedar Hollow were tearing through the huts of the freezing soldiers. A welcome guest was the morning sun as it came looking over the snow-covered hills of the land of Penn. Down near the Potts mansion is seen an old man slowly making his way toward the outpost of Washington's guard.

"Who comes here?" asked the picket.

"Peter Davis," was the reply, "and I want to see Mr. George Washington, the rebel chief," continued the aged peasant.

Ah, he is thinking of the critical situation of the troops of the Colonies; he has been a most wicked man; he has wronged the cause of liberty; before him is the awful sight of the bloody footprints in the snow of those three hideous figures that sit down in the huts of Valley Forge together—Disease, Starvation and Nakedness.

If you, reader, will now approach the scene, I will introduce to you a Tory, an Englishman by birth, a strong defender of the king, and a spy for Lord Howe's army while they are enjoying the festivities of gay Philadelphia. His two sons are soldiers in the Continental army, and the old man has come to ask permission of Washington to visit them as they are now freezing at Valley Forge. He has for many years tilled the fertile soil of Pennsylvania, and rendered a faithful service to the Crown; but the war of the Revolution had brought misery to his household.

Soon a tall man comes upon the scene. The Tory trembles. It is General Washington, who has come to greet the old man and to hear his pitiful story. Ah! This moment is sublime. A Christian gentleman, born to honors, ease and wealth, grasps the hand of a man who has been a terror to all lovers of liberty throughout entire Chester County.

"What is your mission, my dear man?" asked the patriot chief, as he looked with love into the face of the stranger.

"Well, Mr. Washington, you see it is like this: you're a rebel and I am a Tory; but I want to see my two boys."

"Come in and get warm, sir, and I will try to find them," replied the distinguished Virginian.

Soon General Washington summons to his headquarters the adjutant general of the Continental army.

"General," said he, "this man is Mr. Davis, a farmer and a Tory; but even the rights of a Tory must be respected by the army of the Thirteen Colonies. You will find among the enrolled men James and John Davis; and if they are well, dispatch them to my headquarters."

At this juncture, the countersign is given at the door, and there enters the spacious room the Reverend Israel Evans, chaplain of the New York Brigade.

"Good morning, chaplain," said Washington.

"Good morning, General," was his reply. "On this, your forty-sixth birthday, I bring to you the greetings of Chancellor Livingston, and here's a box of dainties with the compliments of Mrs. Livingston."

"May heaven bless them!" replied the glad recipient. "King George may crush out the American cause, but the love of God and the brotherhood of man is with us in this awful hour."

"So, General, this is your birthday; forty-six years? I am nearly twice your age," slowly remarked the Tory; "and I fear God has forgotten me long ago."

The care-worn features of the General and the peaceful face of the chaplain seemed deeply to affect the aged man. A moment of silence prevails, when the old man bursts into tears. It reminds us of a story in that sacred Book of God, in whose revered pages we see Job talking face to face with Jehovah.

"Let us pray," said the army chaplain. "Will you not kneel with the General and myself, Mr. Davis?" asked the reverend gentleman.

The stranger fell to his knees, and a prayer went forth that Peter Davis should no longer remain a Tory or an enemy to human justice.

Soon the sun-dial told the hour of high noon, and the Tory was seated at the dinner table of General Washington. In a short time, his two sons arrived; the meeting was a most joyful one.

Peter Davis went home a changed man that afternoon. He no longer acted as a spy for Lord Howe's army. He never again took the name of God in vain, but became a firm defender of the modest and gentle Nazarene. The Davis farmhouse was at the service of the Continentals during the remainder of their stay at Valley Forge. He lived to see the independence of the Colonies, and many times during the evening of his life, he thanked his Maker that to his heart there came courage to visit General Washington among the huts of the Continental army during the darkest days of war waged against British despotism.

AN AEROPLANIST'S MISADVENTURE

A NEW aeroplane record was established by J. A. D. McCurdy on January 30, when he started out to conquer the Florida Straits by flying from Key West to Havana, a distance of ninety miles. Although he did not realize what he had set out to accomplish, his attempt may be said to be a success, as it was not through any fault of his own that he did not reach his destination. From the beginning of his flight victory seemed certain, and he was within only a few miles of the goal when the accident occurred which prevented him from carrying off the prize. It was a daring undertaking, and the aviator certainly deserves the sympathy of all true sport-lovers that an unlooked-for circumstance prevented achievement of his purpose. McCurdy, however, is a true type of the determined American sportsman, and although disappointed, is in no way disheartened, but intends to try again at an early date, when he believes he will have no trouble at all in succeeding.

There was an $8,000 prize offered for the flight—$5,000 from the Havana Post and $3,000 from the city council of Havana. McCurdy had waited a week for clear skies and a calm atmosphere. The morning was an ideal one for a flight. He ascended from Trumbo Island, Key West, and rose to a height of 1,200 feet, performing many remarkable manœuvres in the air, eliciting cheers from the thousands who had come to witness his departure, among them being Rear-Admiral Lucien Young. Naval tugs, convoys and guides had been placed during the night and were in readiness to direct the flight and offer assistance if needed. As he got well out over the water, McCurdy lowered his machine to about 1,000 feet, and at this height his engine was making a speed of between forty and fifty miles an hour. He was just entering on the last ten miles of his aerial journey when his crank case became ruptured and his supply of lubricating oil escaped. When the sound of the engine told the intrepid aviator that something was wrong, he instantly shut off the power, descended rapidly, and alighted on the water as gracefully as a sea-gull. The aeroplane pontoons were so buoyant that he did not even wet his feet. Two vessels of the squadron hurried to the scene, and the aviator was taken aboard. It is McCurdy's intention to make a second attempt to conquer the Florida Straits at an early date.

Tercentenary of Authorized Version

The Great Event in the Christian World to Be Celebrated This Year

THROUGHOUT the whole English-speaking world, and indeed wherever the Bible is known and read in any modern language, the three-hundredth anniversary of the Authorized Version will shortly be celebrated. In England, it will be the occasion of a grand national religious demonstration in which all the Protestant churches will participate. In this country, the churches and Sunday schools and their allied forces are preparing a programme which will make the celebration a memorable national event.

One of the features of the celebration which cannot fail to be of unusual interest will be the exhibition by the British Museum of a great collection of manuscripts, illustrating the progress of the Bible, from the earliest times to the day of the Authorized Version. Among these are copies of Tyndale's New Testament, the first ever printed in England, the "Vinegar" Bible. the "Treacle" Bible, and the "Wicked" Bible. These were so called from the fact that through a printer's blunder "Vinegar" was substituted for "Vineyard"; "Treacle" was used instead of "Balm in Gilead," and the "Wicked" Bible was so styled because the word "not" was omitted in the Seventh Commandment.

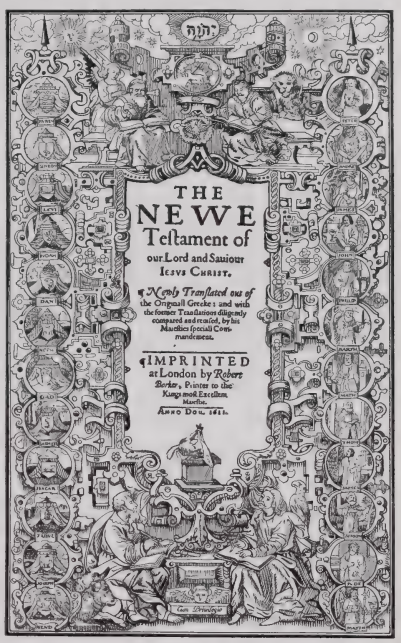
Although the readers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD know and love the grand old Authorized Version, reverencing it as the inspired word and rightly esteeming it as the "greatest work in English literature," there are many who will be glad to know some of the facts not generally known attending its preparation and production.

Fifty-four eminent scholars were appointed by authority of King James I in 1604 to begin the work. Before it was completed this number was reduced by death to forty-seven. They were organized into six companies, two at each of the three centres, Westminster, Oxford, and Cambridge. The first of the Westminster companies undertook the revision from Genesis to the end of Second Kings. A Cambridge company took the version from First Chronicles to the end of Ecclesiastes. An Oxford company undertook Isaiah to Malachi, and the second Cambridge body superintended the translation of the Apocrypha. The second Oxford company revised the four Gospels, the Acts and the Apocalypse, while the second Westminster party took the New Testament from Romans to Jude. A competent critical writer, W. L. Courtney, says:



"The Pentateuch was admirably rendered; Job and the Psalms perhaps not so well. The work of the first Oxford company, dealing with the Prophets, from Isaiah onward, can hardly be better of its kind; but the Apocrypha was by no means so happily rendered, nor yet are the Epistles so well done as the Gospels and Acts."

The work of each company was not always gone over by the other five as had been agreed, nor was there a final revision of the whole work by a small and selected committee, as originally intended.

Among those engaged in this great and sacred literary task were Dr. Lancelot Andrewes, Dean, and afterward Bishop, of Winchester, who was familiar with Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Greek, Latin, and at least ten other languages; Sir Henry Saville, the most learned layman of his time; Dr. Overall, Regius Professor of Theology, afterward Bishop of Norwich, also Dean of St. Paul's; Adrian de Saravia, by birth a Fleming, Prebendary of Westminster, and Canon of Canterbury; Dr. Bedwell, the great Arabic scholar; Dr. Miles Smith and Dr. Ravis, Dean of Christ Church, and Vice Chancellor of Oxford University. Dr. Andrewes was, in a sense, superintendent of the whole.

Many rules were laid down for the guidance of the revisers. They were to follow the Bishop's Bible wherever it was practicable to do so, that being the official Bible of the Church of England at that time. The Genevan Version, however, was more closely followed and to good purpose. Old ecclesiastical words were to be preserved; "Church" was not to be translated "Congregation." If a word had diverse meanings, that which was sanctioned by the use of the early Fathers was to be preferred. Marginal notes were forbidden, except where they were needed to explain a particular Greek or Hebrew word or to explain early coinage or numerals. At the same time the translators claimed the right to use any word or phrase that seemed best suited to their purpose, without adhering always to the same word or phrase to translate the same original term in the Greek or Hebrew.

The Authorized Version was the culmination of a long line of translations, beginning with Wyclif in the fourteenth century, and continuing for two and a half centuries. The first originator of what afterward culminated in the English Bible is Tyndale, whose work bears the date of 1525. To him succeeds Coverdale, then the version of Matthew or rather Rogers, then that which is known as the Great Bible of 1539, then the Geneva Bible of 1560, then the Bishop's Bible (eight years afterward), then the Catholic version, made by members of the Seminary at Rheims and Douai, until there finally came the Authorized Version. The title pages of the first editions of the Bible and the New Testament issued in King James' time are reproduced in facsimile on this page. They are rare curios of the printer's and engraver's art, but rarer and more precious still as reminders of the first appearance of the grand old Bible which has been the standard word of God to the Christian world for three centuries.

The Restoration of Mount Vernon

terrace from another, and are consequently unobservable from the portico of the mansion. Nevertheless in former times they served the rather important function of keeping the cattle from wandering onto the greensward in front of the manor house.

From his earliest boyhood George Washington's life was closely associated with the old Mount Vernon estate. When Lawrence Washington returned from the West Indian campaign, in which he had served under Admiral Vernon, he gave to his estate the name of that gallant commander. Soon after this he married the daughter of a retired Royal Governor of the Bermuda Islands.

Into the refined and elegant associations of this home the boy George came as a favorite visitor. During these years the seeds of that love of the place which later led him to spend lavishly on its improvement were planted.

Later, when Lawrence had gone and the estate fell to the dashing young officer, we find some interesting orders going to friends in England. "As much black velvet as may make a tall man a suit; with buckles and garters for the breeches, and a set of fine-laced ruffles to cost twenty shillings"; inquiries as to the prices of "black and white flag stones, one foot square, nicely cut, that they may make a pavement for the portico"; and later, when the bachelor had become a benedict, the orders changed to include fine linen, silk hose and dainty ribbons and embroideries.

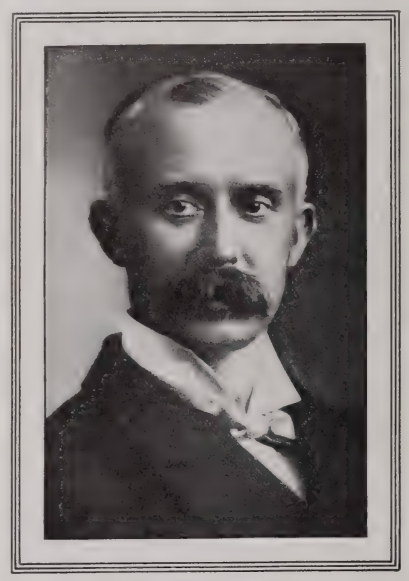
It was not till the last echo of the strife was silent and the Republic was well launched upon its voyage that Washington returned to the old home, after eight years of almost continual absence. Eight years of mighty temporal power had brought only that dignity born of responsibility and a desire to rest. It was at this time that he wrote to his former companion, Oliver Wolcott: "To make and sell a little flour annually, to repair houses (going fast to ruin), to build one for the security of my papers of a public nature, and to amuse myself in agricultural and rural pursuits, will constitute employment for the few years I have to remain on this terrestrial globe. If, also, I could now and then meet the friends I esteem, it would fill the measure and add zest to my enjoyment; but, if ever this happens, it must be under my own vine and figtree, as I do not think it probable that I shall go twenty miles from them."

Many visitors came to Mount Vernon, and those who came as old friends found that they brought keen enjoyment to the General. As his time was taken up with the active superintendency of his estate, those whose visits were prompted only by curiosity saw little of him save at the table. Of this he said in a letter: "I mount my horse and ride around my farms, which employs me till it is time to dress for dinner, at which I rarely miss seeing strange faces, come, as they say, out of respect for me. Pray, would not the word curiosity answer as well?"

Through the declining years of his life, when social duties weighed heavily upon him, Washington called to his assistance Lawrence Lewis, his sister's son. These were days of brilliancy and romance at Mount Vernon. Nelly Custis, Mrs. Washington's daughter, was then a charming, romantic girl of nineteen. The young people were the life of the household, for despite suitors who rode to Mount Vernon, the true romance was within its very doors.

After General Washington's death the property passed to his nephew, Bushrod Washington, and was held by him, his widow, his son, John Augustine, and his grandson, John Augustine II., until 1859, when it was sold to the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association.

Dr. Jowett, by One Who Knows Him



By Rev. WILLIAM DURBAN, London, England

HERE in London, one of the most insistent queries I have for several days heard passing anxiously from lip to lip is, "Will Dr. Jowett leave Birmingham for New York?" And now the answer settles the painful apprehension in a manner which makes us glad for the sake of America, while it gives sorrow to our minds in the interests of England. For in the United Kingdom this highly able, deeply consecrated, and exceedingly popular minister of Christ holds a position quite unique. For over sixteen years he has occupied the pulpit of the great Congregational church at Carr's Lane, Birmingham, which was made celebrated as a citadel of evangelical truth by the ministry, first, of John Angell James, and next by that of Dr. Dale. This remarkable church has only had three ministers in a hundred years!

A year ago, Dr. Jowett, when invited to assume the pastoral responsibility at Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York City, declined the overture under pressure from his Birmingham friends. But to the renewed application he has thought it expedient to yield. He has declined to accept a larger salary than the amount to which he has been accustomed in his English sphere, so that pecuniary inducements cannot be said to have influenced him.

In certain respects, Dr. Jowett is undoubtedly the most influential of British preachers of the time. He is considered by his most competent brother preachers to be the greatest living master of the homiletic art. I have listened with wonder and delight to his deliverances, both from pulpit and platform. He is never ostentatious, never commonplace. Like the famous Dr. Thomas Binney of half a century ago, he is skilled in producing profound effects both on the intellect and on the heart of his hearers by making his arguments somewhat declamatory, and his declamations somewhat argumentative. This method is one of the secrets of his power. Further, he never indulges in "small talk" in his utterances. He can be satirical without becoming embittered, and delicately humorous without descending to the realm of the comic. His preaching often offends the pride of worldly hearers but never shocks their sense of refinement. Not an "anecdotal preacher," he delights in drawing lessons froim incidents that have occurred in his own experience or under the range of his own observation.

It is specially to be noted that Dr. Jowett is not only a great preacher, but is equally noted as a Christian worker and as a leader amongst what are known as the Free Churches, as distinguished from the great Established State Church or Anglican Communion. He was born in Halifax, in Yorkshire, that great nursery of Puritanism and Protestant Nonconformity, in 1864, and received his early education at Hipperholme grammar school. At seventeen he was admitted a student at the Yorkshire Independent College, Airedale, the Congregational Church at Halifax, of which he was a member, recommending him as eligible to enter on a course of preparation for the ministry. Winning a scholarship he proceeded to the University of Edinburgh, where he took his M.A. degree in 1887. Mansfield College, Oxford, gave the finishing touches to his ministerial training, under the training of the famous Principal Fairbairn. In 1889, J. H. Jowett obtained his first ministerial charge at St. James' Congregational Church, Newcastle-on-Tyne. There he remained till 1895, throwing himself with such energy and enthusiasm into the task of developing the various agencies of the church that during his pastorate its membership was doubled.

Rev. J. H. Jowett

The death of the revered and beloved Dr. R. W. Dale in 1895 led to a unanimous call from Carr's Lane to J. H. Jowett. The call was accepted after much prayerful consideration. In his first sermon to his Birmingham congregation Mr. Jowett said: "I have to take up the work of a man who moved with rare and reverent intimacy amongst the greatest truths of the Christian religion. This pulpit has never been belittled by the petty treatment of small and vulgar themes. The familiarities of the pulpit here have been sublimed. I feel my poverty most when I remember the purity and the altitude of spirit which gave possibility to his profound spiritual discernment. To be able to enter, as he did, into the burning bliss of the eternal light required a consecrated and thrice-purified soul."

In sixteen years Dr. Jowett has accomplished a marvelous local work, sociological and philanthropic as well as spiritual. Carr's Lane Church has become a centre from which pulsate potent radiating influences. The building for worship itself has been modernized and beautified at a cost of $35,000. In 1898, the 150th anniversary of the church was commemorated, and it was resolved to purchase a portable iron church to lend to poor congregations, and this was done again and again.

Digneth Institute will be Jowett's own monument in Birmingham. He conceived the idea that the numerous useful agencies which had always been earnestly promoted by the church, could be better pursued if all were brought together in a large, well-equipped, and attractive auxiliary building. This was erected and playing fields were purchased at a total cost of $150,000. The scheme has become famous throughout the land. Mrs. Jowett's class for young women alone has grown to over one thousand members. Dr. Jowett has held the distinguished post of President of the Congregational Union of Great Britain. London has again and again sought to annex him, but he has never listened to any invitation to quit Birmingham until the repeated call was pressed upon him from across the Atlantic.

WHEN THE MOUNTAINEER GOES TO COLLEGE

IN THAT section of the Southland known as Appalachian America, with its nearly 3,000,000 mountaineers, good schools are few and far between. Less than half the white children of school age are enrolled in school. Sixteen counties have no railroad, six no newspapers. With this great problem, the scattered schools—founded by philanthropic effort—are struggling.

Berea, situated on a plateau between the foothills and the blue-grass, is the oldest and largest college. Established at a critical time before the war, it has withstood much adverse fortune and is now entering a period of prosperity and steady growth. It draws a large percentage of its nearly thirteen hundred pupils from the hills, and offers the advantages of an industrial education as well as the opportunity to take a college course.

Some of these students never saw a railroad before coming to Berea. They are not deterred by lack of car-fare—often walking from forty to one hundred miles to reach the college which can give them superior advantages. Many come from little cabin homes in such places as Burning Springs, Lost Creek, Clay Hole, Shoulder Blade, and Sassafras. The principal preparation for their departure in September is to get the work of gathering the "crap," or the fall plowing, as far along as possible, so there will not be too heavy a burden left on the shoulders of the family at home. The boys often wear homespun suits and their belongings are few and easily packed in small compass.

Seldom do these young people, hungering for education, have money enough to pay more than a small share of their expenses. There are few ways of earning money in the mountains except by the sale of the "crap," or some animal which the family are too poor to spare. But the determined young mountaineer who has Scotch, Irish, German, or French (Huguenot) blood in his veins, pluckily resolves to secure work; and he never fails to find friends in Berea if he proves to be made of the right stuff.

The means to defray expenses are often secured in strange ways. One boy captured a wildcat; on his way to the city "zoo" it escaped from its cage, and ranged through the baggage car until its destination was reached. A young man came thirty miles on horseback, and at Berea sold his horse—the only property he possessed—to pay for a year at college. That many of these students are a credit to themselves and Berea, is illustrated in the case of a young man who at the age of nineteen could neither read nor write. In two years, however, he was alternately teaching a country school and attending college, finally being graduated with honors.

He Brought a Young Cow as the Price for His Tuition

A surprising number of these young mountaineers are descendants of Revolutionary ancestors. Their great-grandfathers were a part of that brave army of patriots who defeated the British in the battle of King's Mountain, and sent Cornwallis toward Yorktown. The same resolute spirit which led their ancestors to victory seems to characterize many of the present generation as they wrestle with the problem of obtaining an education.

The industrial department of Berea is a great boon to these mountain students. They are taught a trade, which will be of inestimable value to them and their families when they return home.

Berea has a number of fine buildings. Through Dr. D. K. Pearson's generosity, an abundant supply of pure water from ten mountain springs is brought to the college. In speaking of it he said: "As the water system gathers pure mountain water from many springs and brings it from afar, so Berea College reaches far back into the hills, where the springs of life flow pure and free, and brings them into the reservoir that they may gather power to flow forth and refresh and bless the mountains and the world." The Golden Jubilee Banquet

Seven Hundred Members of the Woman's Union Missionary Society at a Memorable Luncheon in the Hotel Willard, Washington

THE fourth of the Eastern series of celebrations that is being held to commemorate the Golden Jubilee of the Woman's Union Missionary Society of the United States took place recently at Washington. A large and noteworthy gathering was held on February 2 and 3. The accompanying picture of the luncheon, which was served to about seven hundred ladies, was taken at the Hotel Willard on the third. The Washington celebration was all that could be desired. The deepest feeling was aroused. Renewed activity and co-operation are assured as permanent results.

The first three celebrations of the series in the Eastern circuit were held with great success in Cleveland, Louisville, and Nashville. The remainder of the series will take place in a dozen or more of the central cities of the Middle Atlantic and New England States, and will continue till March 17. The culmination of the series will take the form of a monster demonstration in New York City toward the close of next month. It is toward this climax that all the smaller events are working.

Nineteen hundred and ten marked the close of the first fifty years of the activities of the Woman's Union Missionary Society in the United States, the formation of which was the inception of national undenominational work for the oppressed classes of women and children in foreign lands. The celebration of such an anniversary cannot be other then a producer of great impetus for future work.

"The methods followed have been those of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, and the results to be attained are not less important and significant. One million dollars for missions is the goal. The keynote is prayer and co-operation; and chief among the objects worked for is that those who know little of missions, or who are indifferent to them, may, through the Jubilee, get a vision of things as they are and that they may give themselves freely to the work either abroad or at home.

"The Jubilee has been going on since October 12, when it was inaugurated in Oakland and San Francisco with cheering success. A thousand women attended, drawing-room meetings were held and a big luncheon was given. In Portland, Ore., a few days later, there were delegates from twelve cities, eight enthusiastic missionary rallies, and ten missionary speakers. Two thousand women were at the mass meeting in Seattle, Wash.; nine denominations worked together in Omaha, where the city was illuminated for the Jubilee; pageant scenes were introduced and a mass meeting was held for the young people who marched under their denominational banners at Kansas City; there were fine drawing-room meetings and great district rallies in Chicago. St. Louis, Indianapolis, Minneapolis, Milwaukee, Detroit, and Denver all held enthusiastic celebrations.

"The most important results of the Golden Jubilee is the impressing upon Christian women of the greatness of their task. The chief factors in this are the revealing motion pictures showing the dreadful life of oppressed and ignorant women in the Orient; the addresses of the medical missionaries like Dr. Mary Noble; and the speeches and writings of that diligent student of missionary conditions and problems, Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery, of New York, who has also graphically summarized the development of the woman's missionary work at home and abroad."

Women of the Amur in Fish-Skin Clothing

Garments of Fishes' Skins

AMONG the most unique and wonderful garments worn at the present day are the curious fish-skin dresses of the wealthy women of the Gold tribe, living along the Amur River, East Siberia. Though they can neither read nor write, yet these people are producing most astonishing ornaments, designs and embroidery work. The accompanying photograph shows a well-to-do mother and daughter of the tribe dressed in their fantastic ornamented fish-skin gowns. The dress is composed entirely of several layers of fish-skin, the undermost representing the skin of the garment proper, the uppermost showing the ornaments in their cut-out forms. Between these two layers is inserted a middle layer, which serves as a background, throwing out distinctly all parts of the ornaments. The pieces of fish-skin forming the ornaments are generally colored blue. The front and back of the dress is adorned with these cut-out pieces of fish-skin, sewed with fish-skin thread. To be skilful in needlework, they regard as a great merit, which increases exceedingly the value of a girl in the eyes of her father, who includes the amount brought in from this talent in the purchase price of his son-in-law. Men, on the other hand, strive to possess wives experienced in this line of work. Marriage is a commercial matter, and the bride, in nearly all cases, is purchased outright from her father. The purchase price is furs, Chinese stuffs and sometimes money, and one hundred rubles (about $50) will obtain the best-looking needlewoman in the community. A man of the Gold tribe can buy as many wives as his purse will admit, three being about the limit.

PUBLISHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I have noticed several times mention made of making Mont-Lawn a monument in itself to its honored and lamented founder, Louis Klopsch. I cannot see that a more appropriate thing could be done than that this institution be endowed as a memorial to him.

Louis Klopsch needs no monument to keep his memory fresh, as all the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will witness, but if anything is done for his memory let it be the Endowment of Mont-Lawn.

Very truly yours,
T. N. SMITH.

A NOTABLE CANADIAN REVIVAL

By G. A. WARBURTON

THE Chapman-Alexander Mission recently came to a close in Toronto. It began on the fifth of January and continued to the thirty-first. There were in the neighborhood of forty evangelists and singers in Dr. Chapman's party and services have been conducted in twelve centres simultaneously. A large central meeting was held in Massey Hall, which has a seating capacity of about four thousand people, and it was estimated that not less than ten thousand attended services each day. In the outlying districts the meetings were held in some central church, as nearly all of the evangelical bodies united in the work. Big choirs were led by the singers at each centre in the city. Special services were held in factories, shops, railway freight sheds, and wherever men or women could be gotten together. Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander confined their attention to the central district. During one week special services for Christian workers, with a good programme, attracted many from surrounding towns. Special excursion rates were given by the railroads and people came from a radius of a hundred miles to enjoy the benefits of the mission. On Sundays as many as six or eight mass meetings for men were held, the largest being the one in Massey Hall, which has been filled for five Sundays.

Dr. Chapman's preaching has been directed especially to men. His simple and attractive method of delivering his sermons has taken hold of the male part of the community in a very strong way. Among those who have been converted are men of different social grades. At the first big mass meeting hundreds crowded to the front to express their determination to live a Christian life. Among them was one of the leading physicians of the city, who has been known as a man of rather outstanding personality, with a strong fondness for a sporting life. He has become one of the leaders of the mission, has entered into a joyous and happy Christian experience, has determined to give his life to the service of Christ and of his fellow-men. Another young business man who has been conspicuous in the recent meetings, is the manager of a large financial institution in the city, and he declares that he has been a member of the church for many years, but that he has never known Jesus Christ as his personal Saviour until within a very short time.

The Great Evangelistic Gathering in Massey Hall, Toronto

Of quite another sort was a man who has just left me—a motorman on one of the street cars of the city. Dr. Chapman preached one night on "The Unpardonable Sin" and Mr. Harkness, who labors with Mr. Alexander, and who has written most of the music used in the meetings, introduced me to this motorman. I found him in great despair. He felt that he had sinned away the day of grace. He was told of the mercy of God, but he went out of the building in great distress. A day or two later he called on Mr. Harkness at the hotel and after a little talk and prayer, entered into a joyous Christian experience. This morning as I saw him his face was aglow with the new-found joy, and yesterday he told in one of the services of dedicating his whole family to God and of having his wife ask him to pray for her.

There have been hundreds of young men converted in connection with the men's meetings. I have never known a mission in which the Gospel message has been so specifically directed to men. Dr. Chapman feels that he has a special call to that particular type of work. Dr. Chapman is distinctively a conservative preacher as far as his themes are concerned, but he presents them with a freshness and vigor and with a winsomeness that is not only attractive but compelling. He is patient, kind and sympathetic, but always direct. He never for a moment loses sight of the immediacy of the call to repentance and faith. In the after-meetings which he conducts himself he presents the Gospel with the utmost clearness. His formula is substantially this, "Forsake every known sin, take Christ as your Saviour, ask God for Christ's sake to forgive your sin, then go out to follow Christ and do the will of God."

Mr. Alexander's leading of the singing is remarkable in the enthusiasm which it awakens. Simple choruses are used to open the hearts of the people, and again and again men have been converted while these choruses were being sung by the thousands of enthusiastic voices.

Toronto has had the benefit of many missions, but none has ever been planned on anything like an equal scale to the one which just closed. It is too early to fully estimate the results, but so far as is now known there have been more than four thousand persons who have been led to sign decision cards. A vast number of others have had their faith strengthened in the efficacy and the power of the Gospel of Christ to save men from sin and lead them to devote themselves to his service.

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—ALL THE WOMEN and girls of England who bear the name of "Mary" are uniting in contributions to present a coronation gift to the Queen. The contributions extend from a penny to a pound ($5), and that many thousands have already poured in shows how widely the good old Hebrew name of Mary is diffused among British subjects.

—THE BUILDING in Constantinople known as the "Sublime Porte" was almost destroyed by fire a few days ago. The same conflagration damaged the buildings occupied by the Council of State, the Premier and the Minister of the Interior. Turkey's public buildings are of an inflammable character, and there is no adequate fire department in the capital.

—THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Washington, by unanimous consent, has passed a measure known as the Hobson Spy Bill. It has now been sent to the Senate. The bill was introduced by R. P. Hobson of Merrimac fame, and provides for the safe-guarding of our coast defenses from foreign spies. In case of a spy being caught the penalty will be $1,000 fine and one year's imprisonment.

—THE ABSURD feminine fashion known as the "hobble skirt" has a still more ridiculous and ludicrous successor in the "harem skirt," which made its appearance in London last week. It is a bifurcated garment and, as the name implies, is an adaptation of a Turkish lady's dress. It is to be hoped that our sensible women will frown on this acme of fashionable absurdity.

—THE CRUSADE against Mormonism initiated by the International Reform Bureau at Washington is being actively pursued in Great Britain. The special delegate of the bureau to Britain has located one hundred Mormon meeting places in the north of England and 325 Mormon missionaries trying to induce young girls to come to Utah. The Bishop of Liverpool and several members of Parliament have promised to assist a movement to put down this Mormon activity. A committee has been formed to wait on Hon. Winston Churchill, the Home Secretary, and place the matter before him.

—PROFESSOR SAVILLE of Columbia University has just returned from an exploring expedition in Ecuador. He discovered traces of three civilizations in that country, the first dating back about 600 years and showing a much higher type than that of the North American Indians. The relics of the two periods show that the people had developed the art of constructing ornaments from the precious metals. There were other evidences that they well understood pottery and plastic work.

—THERE WAS a great turnout, military and civic, on the occasion of the opening of King George's first parliament in London. In his speech from the throne, the king for the first time used the amended form of the declaration of faith which omits all mention of the Roman Church. It contained no reference to the contention between the political factions, and it is now believed that the battle over the ancient prerogative of the House of Lords will have to be fought all over again.

—GENERAL PIET A. CRONJE, the noted Boer leader, died at Klerksdorp, Transvaal, on February 4, aged 76. Though little has been heard of him for the past few years, he was once a picturesque figure. In the height of his fame he was known as the "Lion of South Africa." He was courageous to recklessness, never turned his back on the foe and only surrendered when nothing could be gained by holding out. During the Boer War, he commanded the Western Army of the South African Republic. England had to send out her two ablest generals, Roberts and Kitchener, with thousands of fresh troops to overcome the rugged old Boer, who fought to the last ditch, but who had to give in at last to the force of numbers.

—THE PRESENT SESSION of the English Parliament will decide the veto power of the House of Lords. It is said that King George has given Mr. Asquith guarantees that if necessary he will create five hundred new peers, chosen by the Liberals, who by their votes would deprive the House of Lords of its present power. If such an outcome takes place it will have no precedent. Gladstone in 1870, in order to carry his measure to disestablish the Irish Church, had a few in sympathy with his views made peers in order to make his bill a law, but never before has occasion arisen for the elevation of as great a number to the Upper House as is now contemplated. However, it is not likely that such an extreme procedure will be necessary in order to free the wheels of legislation from the clog, as the Lords, as at present constituted, will be likely to look to their own interests and defer to the will of the people.

The Span of Life

WITH eager step the youthful climber starts
To reach the summit he beholds afar.
From home, from early friends and scenes, he parts—
To learn life's varied lessons—what they are,
To join in all life's intricate affairs,
He climbs from childhood up on golden stairs.

The vision of that summit greets his eye,
He fain would master all that lies between.
He toils and delves! the years go swiftly by
Ere consummation of his hopes are seen.
Upon the world's wide plain he stands at last,
Impressed with life's great work—how grand! how vast!

He toils, he studies hard, he takes his place
Among the workers for the good and true;
His earnest efforts benefit the race,
He shows the better way with broader view;
Unselfishly he aids his fellow-man,
Fulfilling thus his loving Father's plan.

Of that great work, how little he has done!
It seemeth so, as strength begins to wane.
His steps are downward toward the setting sun,
And shadows broad are spreading o'er the plain.
Yet happy he, if God hath willed it so—
That on his pathway rests a golden glow!

Passaic, N. J. JOHN M. MORSE.

The Klopsch Memorial

WHEN a good man dies, our grief at the blotting out of the bright sun of his daily presence is usually so poignant as to warp our judgment of his real worth. And it is not until the first shock has passed and we can calmly measure the abiding echo of his footsteps in the corridors of time that we can form a correct estimate of just what his loss has meant to the world. So it was with Louis Klopsch. When he passed away it seemed as though the world resounded with the heart-broken cry of those who had called him friend. The exalted and the lowly, the longsuffering and the blessed, alike hastened to laud his memory and to proclaim his righteousness. It was as though the world had cried in unison, "Alas! a good man has gone to his reward. We shall not look upon his like again."

But the world usually has a poor memory, and after the first shock of its grief has passed, it is apt to turn upon its heel and go about its business of barter and sale, of traffic and travail, and forget that one of its best-loved citizens has passed into the bright beyond. Has the world done so in the case of Louis Klopsch? Let us see.

First came letters that followed close upon his death—letters from all sorts and conditions of men and women, and even children; letters of appreciation of his goodness and worth; letters that showed to what extent his personality and his love of his fellow man had wrapped around the hearts of his people. Then came inquiries as to his work—the work which he had inaugurated, and which should not be allowed to lapse with his death. Would there be some one raised in his place to carry it on? Would the cry of the famine-stricken be heeded as of yore? Would the orphans of India, of China and of Japan be taken care of? Would the outcasts of the Bowery be encouraged out of their degradation? Would the children of the tenements be made happy? Many of these letters came with suggestions of help — reminders that the great Christian Herald Family, while it mourned the loss of its chief member, did not mean to let the memory of that loved one pass away.

Somehow it was as though the spirit of his benevolence had diffused itself among his friends, and, now that he was gone, responded through them a thousandfold—as though the force of his great personality had rebounded from the grave, and through the mouths of all his people had cried out: "In your hearts I shall live, and with your hands shall my work be carried on." As though his voice spoke to us through the letters of his people, saying: "What have you done to keep my memory green?"

Like the outpouring of a great flood came the demand to perpetuate his name. "Let there be a monument, but let it not be a shaft of stone." Ay, but what? Some one suggested the Endowment of Mont-Lawn. It was his favorite charity. His old home and his grave lay within sight of its gates. We published one, two, several letters with this suggestion, and in a great tide the approval of his people descended upon us. Mont-Lawn! Mont-Lawn! Of course. What else? Would his people help? Rather ask, Is there any who has not offered help?

It was Irving Bacheller who said of him when he passed away:

"If every man, woman and child whom he had befriended in this wide world, should lay a flower upon his grave, a mountain of fragrance and beauty would arise higher than the highest pyramid."

And now it seems as though every one of all his friends had determined to lay a flower of sweet remembrance, not upon his grave, but upon the great work which was his heart's wish.

If every man, woman and child who called him friend would work earnestly for this memorial to his name—not by contributing money, but by inducing their friends to join the Christian Herald Family—the Endowment of Mont-Lawn would speedily become a fact, and the name and the work of Dr. Klopsch would not die out.

Remember, March 7, the anniversary of his death, is but two weeks off, and your immediate help will have value tenfold. It is your influence with your friends we want—not your money.

The Story of Mont-Lawn

The Children's Paradise

THE idea of Mont-Lawn had its practical inception in the pressing need of the unemployed poor of New York during the winter of 1893-94, when THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was the means of feeding many who otherwise would have starved. But it was really born many years before this in the heart of a poor child, who afterward became the almoner of nations, and whose diligence caused him to "stand before kings."

The childhood of Louis Klopsch was almost as poverty-stricken, and as bereft of human sympathy, as that of any of the children who have visited Mont-Lawn. So hard indeed was it that the impression of its lovelessness never entirely died out of his heart.

The cry of a child bereft was to him a dark horror which could not go unheeded, and it was after all perhaps this desire to do all in his power for the little ones, that drew him into the Sunday School work which was the beginning of his great effort for the uplift of humanity and of religion.

It was the cry of the children for bread, as much as anything else, that led him to establish those CHRISTIAN HERALD food stations in which, during that winter of 1893-94, thousands of people were fed. And when, the winter over, the work accomplished, he found himself still in possession of $7,000 to be used for the benefit of the poor, it was but natural that his mind reverted again to the children. Always the children. The famines of India, of China, and of Japan, left in their wake thousands of orphans whom he felt it his duty to care for. So the conditions of 1893-94 suggested to his mind that the heat of the succeeding summer would work as much havoc on the one hand among the children of the slums, as the cold of the winter had worked on the other.

All through his own childhood he had dreamed of living in some beautiful country place, dreamed of the beauties of that nature to which he was a stranger, but to which his heart naturally yearned. He could not believe but that these other slum children must have dreamed the same dreams, had the same yearnings as himself. Here was an opportunity to vouchsafe them the blessing which he had lacked. Why would it not be feasible to gather together the greatest possible number of children of the slums and take them to the country during those reeking days when life in the tenements means death to thousands of little ones? With Louis Klopsch to think was to act. When he decided to do a thing, it was as good as done.

On the shores of the Hudson, near Nyack, his friend, the Rev. Dr. Jewett, owned a lovely estate which might be available, if Dr. Jewett would but consent. Dr. Klopsch immediately went in the guise of the children's ambassador, and labored with Dr. Jewett. Dr. Jewett was perfectly willing to have his place used as a Children's Paradise, provided a proper rental arrangement could be made. This looked like a poser, for Dr. Jewett's tone was ominous. Louis Klopsch argued the advantages, the blessings, the happiness, the God-given privilege to be free, which was the right of every child. Dr. Jewett argued the advantages of his estate, Mont-Lawn, which provided these very things for the children. What would Dr. Klopsch be willing to pay each year for the use of Mont-Lawn? Dr. Klopsch offered a sum, which seemed commensurate with the commercial renting value of the place. Dr. Jewett shook his head and replied that such a price was out of the question. The best and the only terms he would make would be to rent Mont-Lawn to Dr. Klopsch during his, Dr. Jewett's, lifetime at an annual fee of one dollar! Good old Dr. Jewett! he has long since passed to his reward, and his apparent diffidence was just the result of his quaintly humorous attempt at disguising the generosity of his heart.

The site for a children's summer home thus secured, Dr. Klopsch immediately began to organize his forces and to gather children from the poorest families in the slums. The little ones were taken from the most congested and poverty-ridden parts of the city by missionaries, pastors of churches in the tenement districts, Sunday School superintendents and teachers, and by other charitably disposed individuals. The children were brought in groups to the Bible House, where a physician was in attendance who made careful examination of every little applicant, in order that there might be no chance of juvenile ailments being communicated to the other children. They were then taken up the Hudson to Mont-Lawn in groups of one hundred or more.

During that first season over one thousand children, not one of whom had ever been in the country before in its life, spent at least ten happy days in what soon began to be known as the Children's Paradise of Mont-Lawn on the shores of the Hudson.

Of course, Mont-Lawn then was very different from the Mont-Lawn of to-day. The children an the caretakers slept in improvised dormitories in th old homestead which is still considered the ma building on the grounds; but as the years pass and the number of children grew, so were the accom modations increased as fast as the contributions received from the good friends of Dr. Klopsch would permit. How those friends did respond is evidence in the wonderful equipment of the present-day ins tution, where thousands of children have found hap piness each year.

It is now seventeen years since Mont-Lawn wa first opened as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children' Home. Over 31,000 children have been entertained there for a period of ten days each year, and nothing is left undone to make those the happiest days of the year. Every possible expedient is resorted to and every perfection of equipment is provided to make the children feel that they are no longer waifs of the East Side, but the chosen of God.

A Little Waif — Mont-Lawn Children

Back of the main building is the great open-air dining pavilion where 300 children are seated three times every day to eat their fill of wholesome, well-cooked food. They are given milk and eggs, vegetables from the Home-garden, fresh bread, meat and fruit, and all under healthy conditions which would be impossible in the ill-ventilated tenements of the East Side.

Along the path that leads to the Temple, is a row of cottages, gifts made by contributors to the Home in memory of loved ones passed away. These cottages are filled with little snowy-white beds, and above many of these, hang prettily framed cards bearing the names of those who have endowed the cots for the season.

Near the cottages is the open-air gymnasium, where every appliance is provided for the entertainment of the little ones. Further along the path is the Children's Temple, a beautiful Gothic structure in which the children gather every Sabbath Day for exercises which are so simple and so beautiful that the little ones themselves yearn for the hour to approach.

Every day is a day of joy. There are happy times for the boys on the green where ball-games and swings keep things lively. Groups of interested little ones gather in various nooks listening to the teachers' stories.

"Old Glory" floats on the tall flagstaff, and the exercises which are promoted in its honor, are a source of continual delight and an inspiration to patriotism for the children as they gather and march around their country's flag, for no matter what alien blood may course through the veins of these little ones, most of them, after all, are native-born and all are ready to claim themselves Americans.

Mont-Lawn provides for the children a helpful moral atmosphere and gives them Gospel training which moulds, influences and ennobles their whole lives afterward.

Mothers whose children have spent one season at the Home, beg the privilege of having them go again, so marked has been the change in the hitherto unruly boys or careless girls. Happy children are seldom bad children, and there is an atmosphere in this beautiful place among the hills, which tames and quiets the most turbulent spirits.

After coming under the influence of love, patience and kindness shown them by every one connected with Mont-Lawn, these children seem to develop a new nature, astonishing teachers and parents alike and causing them to take fresh interest in their studies and to show at home an unexpected consideration for others.

Is it any wonder that Dr. Klopsch gradually grew to consider the Children's Home his best loved charity; that he spent more and more time with the children as the years went by? The greater the number of happy faces round him, the greater was his pleasure, and thus the blessing which he was able to confer upon thousands came back thousand fold. He who in his own childhood had been denied his dream of life in the beautiful country place, had been able to realize it for thousands of other children, who, like himself, had passed their first years in the cluttering East Side, but in making it come true for them, he had at last made it come true for himself.

How much this was so, will be appreciated by those who were with him during his last weekly visit to the Home, and saw the look of pleasure upon his face. When he approached the hillside of Mont-Lawn as many as three hundred children would rush down the slope, laughing and calling his name. Truly he must have died with the benediction of that childish happiness ringing in his ears.

And now, it has been suggested that Mont-Lawn be endowed as a perpetual monument to his memory. After all, what could be more fitting? After all, could any mere shaft of stone be at all appropriate in view of such a chance to carry on after his death what was the dearest wish of his heart during life—the continued happiness of little children?

Mont-Lawn Children in the Open-Air Gymnasium

The Grave of Louis Klopsch

DR. KLOPSCH lies buried in Sleepy Hollow Cemetery, just across the Hudson from Mont-Lawn. It was his own wish to be laid away within sight of the Children's Paradise, which he had founded, and in which he had spent so many happy hours. Standing by his grave you may see Mont-Lawn nestling on the distant hillslope. It is in the heart of the famous wonder country, which American Indians in the olden days believed was the favorite earthly dwelling place of the Great Spirit.

That his own great spirit still pervades Mont-Lawn is not hard to believe after a visit to this wonderful place. The selection of the site was in itself an inspiration very much like the carrying out of some divine plan. Here among the foot hills of the Catskill Mountains, the country teems with all that is most lovable and inspiring of the early history of America.

Here the first American legends, and fairy and folk tales were written; the very names of grassy glades and hillsides, of difficult ravines, flowery meadows, and laps of land along the Hudson are as if little children of the early days had chosen them. Sleepy Hollow, Anthony's Nose, Eagle's Nest, Point-No-Point, the Great Stone Face, for example, and Sunny Side, where Washington Irving wrote the immortal legend of Rip Van Winkle, the beloved old sleeper of these fairy-haunted hills.

It was of the great face cut in the rocky profile of the mountain that Nathaniel Hawthorne wrote: "It was a happy lot for children to grow up to manhood or womanhood with the great face before their eyes. For all of the features were noble, and the expression at once grand and sweet, as if it were the glow of a vast, warm heart, that embraced mankind in its affections, and had room for more—it was an education to look at it."

Aye, written years ago though it was, is there not something in this description which fits into the character of Louis Klopsch? Did not the children of Mont-Lawn look upon him with just that feeling? Is there one who, having known his character well, would deny "that all its features were noble, the expression grand and sweet as if it were the glow of a vast, warm heart that embraced mankind in its affections, and had room for more?

Had he lived, he would have endowed Mont-Lawn himself. Dead, we must do it for him. True, his Paradise for children offers them nothing more than blue sky, grass, trees, bird songs, good clean food and clothing, from the priceless plenty of the world. But nothing else, after all, is needed to make it a paradise, unless it be one thing—the assurance of its continuance, the feeling that its creator, Louis Klopsch, may still be able to rest there in Sleepy Hollow, happy in the knowledge that his work has not been in vain.

"Is Your Name Written There?"

IN THE centre of this page is a picture of the interior of the Temple at Mont-Lawn, crowded with East Side children singing a patriotic song and waving American flags. From the rear the light pours through the beautiful stained glass window, representing Christ Blessing the Little Children, which was the personal gift of Dr. Klopsch to the Temple.

It is on the walls of this Temple, on tablets that will stand as long as the Temple itself, that the names of those who become Patrons of the Klopsch Memorial will be inscribed.

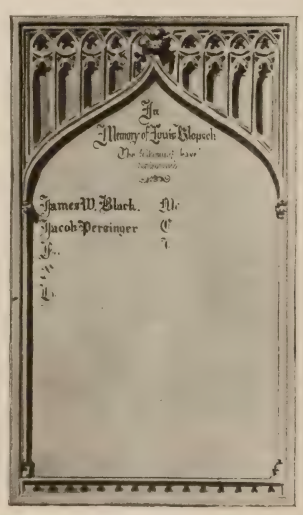
On the lower part of this page is a suggestion of these tablets containing two names, the first to be sent in by friends who have earned the right to become patrons of the Klopsch Memorial. Each of these friends sent us ten new subscriptions, accompanied by $15.00, with the understanding that one-half, or 75 cents for each subscription, would be credited to the Memorial Fund.

We cannot say how gratified we are at this affecting evidence of the determination of our friends to make the Memorial to Dr. Klopsch a permanent fact. Each of these friends might have sent in a personal contribution, which would have been very acceptable as far as it went. But think, on the other hand, how much more it means to the Klopsch Memorial for them to lend their personal influence to the movement, with the result that twenty new friends have been added to the list.

Interior of the Children's Temple, Mont-Lawn, Where Patrons' Tablets Will Be Placed

Not only does the introduction of these friends mean a greater amount of money for the Klopsch Memorial, but they must needs in the end become vitally interested in all of those projects for the uplift of religion and humanity, which were inaugurated by Dr. Klopsch, and which are still being urged on to fruition along the lines laid down by him.

"Is your name written there?" The lines of the old hymn seem especially applicable. Here are two friends at least who will for the rest of their lives have the satisfaction of knowing that come what will their names will hang on the walls of the Children's Temple at Mont-Lawn as long as the Temple lasts.



Are you striving to have your name written there? Would it not be a personal satisfaction to you, as it must be to them, to have it so written? Remember, the day approaches, March 7, the anniversary of the day on which Dr. Klopsch passed away. If you mean to be included in the list of Patrons, do not delay asking your friends.

Last week we published ten coupons with the suggestion that you cut them out, and ask your friends to sign one each. The receipt of ten such coupons from you, accompanied by at least $15.00, will entitle you to have your name inscribed permanently upon one of the tablets, which will be placed on the walls of the Temple. If you have friends at a distance, who you think would be benefited by reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, mail some of these coupons to them, asking them to fill them in at once, because the time when you can take advantage of this opportunity to become a Patron is short.

Remember, that in asking your friends to do this for you, you are not asking them to do something for nothing, since in addition to helping you become a Patron of the Klopsch Memorial, they will themselves be receiving THE CHRISTIAN HERALD every week for a whole year, and who can calculate the amount of good this may do them in the way of spiritual uplift? If you try, you will really find it is much easier than it looks.

If you prefer not to approach your friends, but to give them the benefit of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a year, you may fill out ten coupons with their names, and send them to us, accompanied by $15.00. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will then be sent to your friends for a whole year, and you will become a Patron of the Klopsch Memorial, and your name will be inscribed upon a tablet which will be placed in the Children's Temple, which is pictured on this page.

Remember, we would rather have your influence than your money. It means more to the Klopsch Memorial and to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It was the chief ambition of Dr. Klopsch to increase the influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, until it became a world power for the uplift of religion. It was through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that he was enabled to carry on those great charities which made him famous. The orphans of India, the famine-stricken people of China, the starving thousands of Finland and of Russia—these have called the name of Dr. Klopsch blessed. Yet, without the influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD he would never have been able to do so much good. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is carrying on this great work along the lines laid down by Dr. Klopsch himself, and in earnest of its good intentions in that direction, it has within the last month sent $26,000.00 to China, to be used for the immediate relief of the famine stricken. This campaign and others of a similar nature will be carried on as circumstances dictate. We need you and we need your influence with your friends more.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family" is not an empty name. There probably exists nowhere on earth such another congregation of Christian persons, so unified by the desire for the uplift of their fellow-man. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is the central bureau of communication for all of these persons, now numbering nearly one million souls. Let us make it many million, and let our rallying cry be "The Klopsch Memorial"; for the Children's Paradise was not a dream of ours, understand, but of Louis Klopsch, who was the inspiration of all for which Mont-Lawn and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD stand.

It will be a memorable day when the tenement waifs of New York meet together in a home endowed beyond the need of further appeal; when they gather in the Children's Temple at Mont-Lawn, to sing the sweet old hymns and see around them on the walls the names of their living benefactors, who have made possible the free gift of this beautiful home.

Let us work and hope so that on some perfect day in the coming summer Mont-Lawn bells may fling out far and wide, across hill and valley and river, a joyous peal announcing that the Children's Paradise is endowed, and that the one memorial which its founder would have wished for above all others is completed.

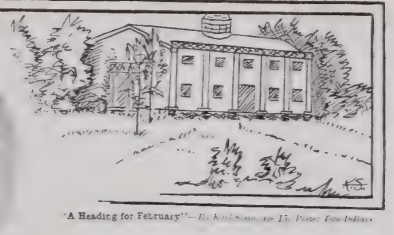
Our Boys and Girls

Cozy Corner Prize Work

A Puppet-Box

DEAR COZY CORNER: It is such great fun to do all kinds of interesting things and then tell you about them. I hope you will like my Peep-Show Box, and will tell the other boys and girls about how to make one. I have had such fun with mine.

I take an ordinary pasteboard shoe box, turn it bottom side up, cut a large round hole in the bottom nd a peep-hole an inch square in one end. I en cover it, all but the peep-hole, with crinkly ellow or red tissue paper. Strong light shinig through the tissue paper gives a lovely ffect inside the box. And this is about all there to the box itself.



From magazines, advertisements, and toy ooks, I have cut all kinds of little people and hings. I am very careful to leave nough paper at the bottom of each nt-out to turn back and paste on the nderside of the lid of the box, for on he lid I arrange all manner of harming little scenes. Sometimes I ave a lot of boys and girls dancing nd playing games. Then, again, the rown-up people are all at home in he dining-room or drawing-room. ne scene of which I am especially nd is a storm at sea. In my picre there are several little boats pparently tossing about among the breaks, and, very far at the back, there is a ght-house with a bright red light shining. paste gray tissue paper over the big hole the box for this scene, and the effect is ormy and fine.

I am planning, dear Miss Porter, a Mother Goose party exactly after the one ou told us about in the Cozy Corner a few eeks ago. I have cut up a whole big book f Mother Goose pictures, and I put the haracters together in the most amusing ay.

Jack Spratt and his wife entertain Jack nd Jill at dinner. Mistress Mary, in a eautiful bower of silver bells and cockle hells and pretty maids all in a row, gives garden party to plenty of Mother Goose olks, and it is all dear and funny.

I do hope that ever so many of the Cozy orner girls and boys will make Peep-Show oxes, and have as much fun as I have had ith mine. VERA HARRISON, age 16.

"The River"

Useful and Very Pretty

IT WAS a rainy Saturday, and I wanted something to do, so I hunted out mother's scrap bag and cut all the prettiest pieces into narrow strips. Of these strips I rolled three good-sized balls and then began to plat them up. Before very long I had more than thirty-eight feet of platting, and I then began to coil it up, whipping it evenly with linen thread on the under side as I went along. By evening, a pretty mat with a bright red centre was finished and lying flat on the nursery floor by the baby's crib. Mother says it is really very useful and exceptionally pretty.

ORA MICHAEL, age 14.

Baby Darling

Oh, look, baby darling! All through the air
Are white-winged fairies everywhere,
Weaving a blanket so soft and white
To cover the sleepy old world to-night.
Busily working ere daylight flies,
Hither and thither each fairy hies,
Spreading the blanket so soft and white.
How cozy the old world will sleep to-night!

The Translation of Elijah*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

God's Own Time

GOD knew that Elijah's work was done upon earth, so he determined to take the prophet unto himself. A time will come when our work also will be finished, and then the summons shall come to call us to a scene of greater activity in the eternal home. There are some who do not realize the extent of their work, and imagine it is over, when, in reality, there is much of it yet to be performed. An aged woman was supposed to be on her deathbed. Her life had been one of particular usefulness as a missionary in foreign lands—she had worked hard, age had come upon her, and she felt her usefulness was past, and that there was nothing more for her to do, so she returned to her native land to prepare for the end. As she lay on what she thought was to be her deathbed, her son came into the room. The feeble woman raised her eyes and looked upon him as she murmured, "My dear boy, my time has come." "Why do you think so, mother?" he inquired. "Because there is nothing more for me to do," she wearily exclaimed. "Oh, yes, there is, mother, something more for you to do, some one wants your help. An aged Jew was here yesterday, begging for your assistance. He is in want; can you not help him?" On hearing this, the apparently dying woman exclaimed, "I shall help him, I shall help him, send for him immediately." When the old man came, she arose from her bed to minister to his wants. She now felt that her usefulness was not past; she willed to do more, so the vigor of life returned to her limbs and she lived eight years longer to help all who came to her door for material assistance or spiritual advice. This story is suggestive; we must not let go before God's time, before he wills us to come unto him: we must lay hold on life by being nobly active, we must live more for others than for ourselves and sink personality in our efforts for the welfare of our brethren. It is for us to do God's work, to conform to his will. This did Elijah do; his whole strength went out in doing the will of God. "When Jehovah would take him up," the prophet seemed to be at the zenith of his activities, standing face to face with a king, rebuking him for covetousness, murder, and theft. But that when was the time the Lord determined to call him. The eminent London divine, Dr. Joseph Parker, said, "When is the doctrine of Providence over human life."

The Choice of Elijah

Elijah did not murmur against being cut off in the midst of his usefulness; an expression which we hear so often and so unadvisedly used, when the death of some Christian worker or famous preacher of the Gospel is announced. But it is not God's way to cut off any life in the midst of its usefulness, he only calls when the allotted task on earth is finished. His methods are inscrutable to us, but we should realize that

> God moves in a mysterious way,
> His wonders to perform.

When we see any one called away whose work seems unfinished, we should reflect that heaven offers a vaster arena in which to do the work of God than earth offers, though there

Telephone Etiquette

Co-operation is the keynote of telephone success.

For good service there must be perfect co-operation between the party calling, the party called, and the trained operator who connects these two.

Suggestions for the use of the telephone may be found in the directory and are worthy of study, but the principles of telephone etiquette are found in everyday life.

One who is courteous face to face should be courteous when he bridges distance by means of the telephone wire.

He will not knock at the telephone door and run away but will hold himself in readiness to speak as soon as the door is opened.

The 100,000 employees of the Bell system and the 25,000,000 telephone users constitute the great telephone democracy.

The success of the telephone democracy depends upon the ability and willingness of each individual to do his part.

is no necessity there of removing evil and distress, for such do not exist; but there will be a glorious opportunity for the development of Godlikeness, and those who have helped in this direction here will find a much larger field of activity, one that will be unhampered by evil.

Elijah had a care that his work on earth should not stop when he himself would be called away from it. He was at the head of a school of prophets, a position which in our time, may be said to correspond to that of Dean of a Theological Seminary. He had many brilliant students and he might have chosen the brightest among them to carry on his work when he himself would be gone, but this he did not do. His choice fell upon one who performed the duties of a servant—the humble Elisha. In II. Kings 3: 11, we read: "Elisha, the son of Shaphat, poured water on the hands of Elijah." From the incidents, however, that followed Elijah's choice of Elisha, we are inclined to think that the latter stood more in the position of a son to the former than a servant. When the prophet told Elisha that the Lord was about to take him hence, Elisha asked that a son's inheritance might be given unto him, not in lands or riches, for Elijah had none such possessions, but an inheritance of the Spirit; that is, the power to do as the prophet had done. Elisha was "a son in the faith" to Elijah, as in after years Timothy was to the great Paul; that Elijah so considered him is shown by his act of throwing his mantle over the shoulders of Elisha (I. Kings 19: 15-21).

The Translation of Elijah

When the time came for Elijah "to be taken up," Elisha craved that he might be a worthy successor, and so intense was his spirit, that he again begged for an inheritance, this second time for a double portion of a father's lofty powers. Alas, that worthy fathers are often succeeded by unworthy sons! The example of a noble father ought to be the greatest incentive to a son to imitate him and walk in his footsteps and act toward the world and God after the manner of such an exemplar.

When Elijah's time came he was translated from earth to heaven in a chariot. Most of us are familiar with the pictures which represent Elijah as being taken up to heaven in a chariot drawn by fiery steeds. For such pictures there is some warrant, for while the prophet was being taken up Elisha exclaimed, "My father, my father, the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof!" Human words, however, are weak to express divine manifestations. We must believe that what Elisha saw were ministering spirits of light sent to bear Elijah from earth to heaven. The spot of earth from which his feet were lifted was on the other side of Jordan in the land of Moab. He and Elisha had crossed the Jordan as on dry land, for when Elijah spread his mantle and touched the waters with it, as with a rod, they rolled back on either side allowing himself and companion to pass over to the land of Moab dry shod. It was in the land of Moab that God had buried Moses and it was the same land he had chosen for the translation of Elijah. As the prophet was being taken up his mantle fell upon Elisha, thus indicating by this sign, that his humble follower was to be his successor. We can fancy seeing Elisha gazing steadfastly up toward heaven, as he looked upon his master ascending. His eyes were not dimmed by tears, but a divine fire kindled them, and so far from becoming weak with fright, he received strength from the glorious vision. In our present days of aerial navigation we are forcibly reminded that Elijah made the highest record, a record which no one will ever be able to transcend. His was a heavenly aeroplane and there was no danger of falling. We believe that many such aeroplanes unseen are constantly bearing upward souls to God, and it would be well for man to see to it that they may be able to secure passage on such when they are summoned to take the last flight.

Triumphing Over Death

"Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil." It is only the shadow of death through which the Christian passes. Why should we fear death when our Saviour has passed through it and lived again? Moreover, has not Jesus said, "Because I live, ye shall live also!" Being afraid of the shadow of death is very much like a person being afraid of his own shadow, that is, the shadow of his physical body. God with us, we can have no fear. One day a Scotch minister was summoned to the deathbed of a parishioner. When the dominie arrived the sick man, looking up, gaspingly said: "Minister, I am dying and I'm afraid." The clergyman opened his Bible and read from it some of God's messages to the dying, but the man on the bed interrupted him, "I ken them a'," he said mournfully, "but somehow they dinna gie me comfort." "What! do you not believe them?" asked the minister, in astonishment. "With a' my heart," answered the man. "Where, then, is there any room for fear with such facts?" "For a' that, minister, I'm afraid, I'm afraid." The minister then turned to the twenty-third psalm and read: "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me." The face of the dying man brightened as he weakly cried out, "I see it, I see it, the shadow does not bide, neither will death. I will soon be in the light again."

True to the Master

When Elisha arrived at Jericho wearing Elijah's mantle, the students came out to meet him. They recognized him as their leader and begged of him that they might be permitted to go and search for the body of Elijah, "lest he had been cast upon some mountain or into some valley." Elisha said, "No," but they urged him so strongly, that at length he permitted them to go, knowing that their failure to find the body would be the most convincing argument that the Lord had really translated the prophet to heaven bodily. Men searched for the body of Moses and found it not. After three days the students returned from their unsuccessful search for the body of Elijah, and then they were willing to accept the truth as to their master's translation.

As we have seen, Elisha did not remain in the place where Elijah had been lifted up and call it "holy ground," but he hastened back to the scene of Elijah's labors among the students. In so doing he showed himself a worthy successor of the illustrious prophet, he also displayed his wisdom. By coming back to Jericho he put himself in touch with the spirit of his departed master and friend, while, had he remained in Moab, he would have only intensified the separation. We are brought nearer to those who have gone before through prayer and Christian activities.

It is the bond that we have in Christ which brings us together and keeps us together. Let us consider the beautiful sentiment of the Christian gentleman, who, thought to be dying, serenely and calmly looked on the anxious faces of the friends around his bedside and thus consoled them, "If I die I shall be with God, if I live he will be with me."

TO THE HIGHEST BIDDER

Serial Story by FLORENCE MORSE KINGSLEY

XXIII—Continued

"DON'T you want some ice-cream, Jennie?" asked David.

The girl hesitated.

"I came t' the fair with Gus Bamber," she said. "An' what do you think? We hadn't no more'n got here when Sutton got after Gus t' help in the refreshment booth. Said the other fellow he'd hired wasn't no good at the business; an' so nothin' would do but he must have Gus t' help. Both of us was awful mad; but we didn't das' say so to ol' Sutton. He's somethin' fierce if you don't do 'xactly as he says."

"Who's Gus?" asked David.

"Well, that's pretty good!" giggled the girl. "I guess you'd ought t' know Gus Bamber b' this time. He waits on you often enough at the Eagle."

"Oh, you mean Sutton's man—Gus; yes, that's so. I didn't know his name was Bamber, though."

"It is," the girl said, "Augustus Bamber. I think it's a real nice name, too. But I don't like it 's well 's I do yours."

"That's kind of you," drawled David. "Mrs. Augustus Bamber sounds pretty well, though—eh, Jennie?"

The girl moved her shoulders gently.

"No, no, no, no!" she said positively. "'N' I've told him so more'n fifty times already, I guess."

She lifted her eyes to David's with innocent coquetry.

"I don't b'lieve in gettin' married t' anybody 'less you're awfully in love with 'em. That's what I keep tellin' Gus, but he says——"

"Are you coming with me to get that ice-cream?" asked David, stifling a yawn.

"I dunno whether I've got the nerve," murmured the girl. "The ice-cream's in the same booth where Gus is; it's right acrost from where Sutton's got his concession. 'F he should see me—with you——"

"What do you suppose he'd do about it?" inquired David. "Gus—er—went off and left you, didn't he?"

He paused to laugh sourly, then added, "And my girl wouldn't come with me, so I guess it's up to us to do the best we can to have a good time, Jennie. If you'll come along with me, we'll take in the whole show."

"If you think it would be all right, Mr. Whitcomb."

"Why shouldn't it be all right, I'd like to know?"

"I don't know, only——"

"Only what? Out with it, little girl."

"I—I'm kind of scared of you, Mr. Whitcomb," faltered the girl.

David laughed outright. The girl's eyes and voice conveyed so delicious a flattery that he could not help the tenderness that crept into his words.

"Why, you dear little goose, you," he said in her ear. "I won't hurt you, and nobody else shall, either, when I'm around. Come, we'll go and eat that ice-cream, right where Augustus Bamber, Esquire, can see us; then we'll take in the other attractions. Have you seen anything yet?"
